Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I make this formal motion for the purpose of attracting the attention of Congress to a matter entirely outside of this bill. It is my imperative duty to bring it to your attention. The metropolitan newspapers report yesterday and to-day, under headlines showing various degrees of alarm, bread riots in the city of New York. The expression "bread riots" is hardly applicable to the situation. When women and children cry for bread you can not designate it as a riot. It is an outcry to heaven for relief. I doubt whether Congress will find time to investigate this most serious leak-the leak of prosperity. Prosperity seems to have leaked out, to have disappeared. The strange thing about the city of New York is this: The three principal items of expense of the poor man's family are food, clothing, and rent. New York City is the greatest manufacturer of clothing in the country. The clothing industry is the largest industry in the State of New York and the largest industry in the city of New York. There is no truer barometer of prosperity than the condition of the clothing industry. The clothing industry in New York, which employs about 300,000 people, is not enjoying any perceptible degree of prosperity for the simple reason that whatever increase of wages the workers throughout the country might have received during this extraordinary pros perity due to European conditions has been eaten up by the increased prices for food

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman has observed in the public press to-day that the President is insisting upon an appropriation of $400,000 to investigate this food proposition?

Mr. LONDON. I have; and of course the President's proposition for an investigation should be indorsed by every Member of Congress; but we are dealing here now with an immediate situation requiring immediate action. The people are now literally facing starvation, and do not forget that it is the men and women who, if they have any fault, have the fault of working too hard, of working beyond human endurance, that are in distress. These are not the wives of idlers who are now complaining of the lack of bread. I am wondering whether Congress will take the time now, when it is throwing away or giving away hundreds of millions of dollars, billions of dollars, for fortifications and navies, dreadnaughts and armies, to devote a couple of hours to the consideration of the national control of food. We have bread riots, not in Vienna, not in Berlin, not in Petrograd, but in New York, the richest city of the richest country in the most prosperous period in the history of the country. I call the attention of Congress to the bill which I introduced on the 21st of December, 1916, which deals with this problem. I know that the proposition I submit is extremely radical. The bill provides that the commission which is to be appointed shall prepare or recommend legislation to enable the Government of the United States or some governmental agency to be created by law to regulate the transportation, marketing, preservation, and distribution of food, and to acquire and maintain, build and construct, equip, manage, own, and control all such buildings, plants, structures, warehouses, granaries, abattoirs, and each and every thing incidental to, connected with, or necessary to the exercise by the Government of complete control of the supply and the dis-

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. I know that the idea of national control of food does not appeal to the average American mind, but the question is this, Shall we by clinging to prevailing theories permit the food of the country, the social needs of the people, to be controlled by private capital, merciless, unscrupulous, lacking conscience, or shall the question of food and food prices be taken up by the people as a national problem?

For all practical purposes, so far as the great common masses of the people are concerned, they are now in the same condi-tion as if we were at war. While we are at peace we are suf-fering from war prices. I do not know how the poor man lives now; I do not know how the men earning on an average of $15 to $20 a week can keep body and soul together with the present inflated prices of the necessities of life.
Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.
Mr. FESS. Is the gentleman's measure a temporary measure or is it to be a permanent one?

Mr. LONDON. Well, all measures that take a radical step forward are originally temporary; they become permanent in I suggest this measure as a measure which the hour is calling for. Whether it shall become permanent depends upon the question of whether it shall have furnished the relief.

Mr. FESS. I think I am in sympathy with what the gentleman wants to do if it means to meet a temporary situation that ought to be cured, but I have some doubt as to whether I would want to go into the permanent fixing and controlling the prices of food.

It is not a theory that we are dealing with-Mr. LONDON. I am willing at the present moment to get all the aid I can to relieve the situation right now, and I ask for the aid of every Member of Congress. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]
I submit a copy of the bill I refer to.

bill (H. R. 19295) to create a commission which is to recommend legislation for the taking over by the Federal Government of the control of food, and to authorize the President to prohibit under certain conditions the exportation of food.

certain conditions the exportation of food.

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created, to be known as the Federal Food Commission, to consist of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor.

SEC. 2. That the said commission shall proceed immediately to ascertain all facts relating to the supply of food and food products in the United States. Should it appear that the supply of food is insufficient for the needs of the country it shall be the duty of the commission to so certify to the President, who shall thereupon, by proclamation, prohibit the export from the United States of any farm products and of any article of food. Upon the issuance of the said proclamation, and until the order prohibiting exportation shall be revoked, it shall be unlawful to export any article of food or any farm products from any part of the United States.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the commission to recommend such additional and further legislation as may be necessary to make the embargo effective.

SEC. 4. That the prohibition shall remain in effect until the commission shall certify that the supply of food and food products permits of the resumption of the export of food and food products, and thereupon the President shall suspend the embargo.

Sec. 5. That the commission shall prepare and recommend legislation to enable the Government of the United States, or some governmental agency to be created by law, to regulate the transportation, marketing, preservation, and distribution of food, and to acquire and maintain, build and construct, equip, manage, ewn, and control all such buildings plants, structures, warehouses, granaries, abattoirs, and each and every thing or things incidental to, connected with, or necessary to the exercise by the Government of complete control over the supply and distribution of food.

Sec. 6. That the commission shall prepare and recommend plans for cooperation with States, municipalities, and with cooperative societies and with now existing governmental agencies. It shall be the duty of the commission to report its recommendation to Congress through the President on or before the 1st of February, 1917.

Sec. 7. That the commission is authorized, as a whole or by subcommittees of the commission duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States; to send for persons and papers; to administer oaths; to summon and compet the attendance of witnesses and to compet testimony; to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission is created; and to rent such offices, to purchase such stationery and other supplies, and to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary to carry out the purposes for which the commission is created.

Sec. 8. That the sum of $50,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the use of the commission.

Sec. 9. That this act is to take effect

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That $20,100, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, in addition to the above sum, for the purchase of the necessary machinery for the manufacture of clothing at the Jeffersonville depot of the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer committee amendments. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report them.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, line 6, strike out the words "hereby appropriated in addition to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of"; page 34, line 7, strike out the comma after the word "sum" and insert after said word the following: "may be expended."

Mr. KAHN. Is not the first amendment "out of"? Mr. DENT. So that it would read——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the Clerk read it as it will appear as amended?

Mr. DENT. The way it would read is this:

That $20,100, or so much thereof as may be necessary of the above sum, may be expended for the purchase of the necessary machinery— And so forth.

In other words, the $20,100 as it reads would be an addition and it should be out of that appropriation. That is the way the committee intended.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Horses for Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineers: For the purchase of horses of ages, sex, and size as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for remounts, for officers entitled to public mounts for the Cavalry, Artillery, Signal Corps, and Engineers, the United States Mülitary Academy, service schools, and staff coileges, and for the Indian scouts, and for such Infantry and members of the Hospital Corps in field campaigns as may be required to be mounted, and the expenses incident thereto, and for the hire of employees: Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number now on hand, shall be limited to the actual needs of the mounted service, including reasonable provisions for remounts, and, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of War, no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster Corps and an inspection under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War. When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market at all military posts or stations, when needed, at a maximum price to be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any horse below the standard set by Army regulations for Cavalry and Artillery horses, except when purchased as remounts or for instruction of cadets at the United States Military Academy; And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for polo ponies except for West Point Military Academy; and such ponies shall not be used at any other place, $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 35, line 21, by striking out "$100,000" and insert-g "$400,000." ing

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is rather due to us, if the gentleman would state why this great reduction is made from the amount appropriated last year and why the great increase from the amount recommended by the committee in the first instance. It seems to be like those three shells under which you can not spot the little ball.

Mr. DENT. The reason is given by the War Department in the hearings before the committee, which briefly are that the Government has a surplus of something over 8,000 horses and something over 3,000 mules now which were purchased on account of the border situation.

Mr. MANN. I read only a few days ago, within a week, where the Government had seized a train of mules in Illinois consigned to other people. Why is that?

Mr. DENT. I do not know, all I know is that in the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs the statement was emphatically made that this item was reduced because of the fact that they had a surplus of some 8,000 horses and over 3,000 mules now that they could not use, which were purchased for use on the border, but which were now unnecessary, because the troops of the National Guard were being mustered out. The gentleman notices the proviso authorizes the Secretary to sell the surplus horses and mules which we have on hand and utilize this appropriation for the purpose of purchasing horses

Mr. MANN. I noticed the proviso. Does not the Secretary have that authority now without the proviso?

Mr. DENT. I take it he has not, because he asked for authority in this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman please explain why he now offers the amendment raising this appropriation from $100,000 to $400,000 when we had agreed upon $100,000?

Mr. DENT. The reason for that, I will state to my colleague on the committee, is that the Secretary of War, in a letter in which he called attention to certain appropriations made in this bill, criticizing some of them as not being sufficient, has convinced me, and I have spoken to several members of the committee, that we made that too low.

He stated emphatically that if we leave it at $100,000 the three remount stations that the Government now has will have to be abolished; that he needs at least that amount of money to keep up the remount stations now provided for by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it may be pertinent in this connection to make an inquiry that is covered in the proviso. I had intended to reserve a point of order on the following proviso, with the idea of inquiring of the chairman of the committee whether he did not think it good legislative practice in authorizing the Secretary of War to sell the surplus horses and mules, to have those funds turned into the Treasury rather than to have them utilized for purchase of other horses and mules, so that the committee or Congress can not have any control over the appropriation of that item?

Mr. DENT. Yes. It is provided it shall be used simply for that purpose, and it may be that they will need it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but the committee will never know how much money is being used for that purpose if you allow the department to have the privilege of selling horses and mules and using the funds resulting from that sale in the purchase of other horses and mules. It will be far better in the matter of its control by Congress to have the committee know each year how much is being utilized in the purchase of horses and mules.

Mr. DENT. I do not know why Congress could not ascertain that if we leave the language as it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course Congress can ascertain, but if we leave the language as it is we know that Congress can not do so unless there has been a specific estimate made by the department asking for a certain amount.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman will understand that these surplus horses and mules that the War Department now has were acquired under authority for purchase of horses and mules for the Cavalry and for the Field Artillery, and unless the funds that arise from the sale of these horses and mules shall be available for that purpose it may be necessary to increase the appropriation to the amount of this item.

Mr. STAFFORD. Naturally. And yet the committee would know how much money was being spent each year for the purchase of horses and mules, whereas otherwise they would not. am only suggesting a conformance with the usages in keeping with the usual practice.

Mr. McKELLAR. The committee will have a detailed statement of this matter before it next year.

Mr. STAFFORD. But they will never go to that trouble unless the amount is asked for.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman is wrong about that. The committee goes into these matters most minutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will give credit to this committee for being energetic, but I do not give it credit for being so exemplary that they do something that no other committee does.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell for cash at either public or private sale such horses and mules as are not needed for either the Regular Army or the National Guard: Provided further, That the proceeds arising from such sale may be used for the purpose of carrying out the provision of the foregoing item: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used until the funds arising from the sale of such animals shall have been first exhausted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman can advance some good reason why this authorization should be granted, I will feel called upon to make the point or order. I have no objection to authorizing the Secretary of War to sell these surplus horses and mules for cash, but I think the proceeds should be turned into the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts. Neither will I raise any objection to increasing the amount that may be needed for the service, but I do maintain that Congress should have control over the expenditures of these various items and not allow funds to be used interchangeably and without control.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee will remember, I believe that language was inserted simply because we cut the amount of the appropriation to $100,000. The committee felt that the department ought to be allowed to use a part of the money for the purposes contained in the preceding paragraph. Now that the committee has raised the amount of that appropriation to $400,000 I do not think the provision is at all necessary.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman does not mean to state that there ought to be authority to sell these?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I want the authority to sell.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order and move to strike out, with the permission of the chairman. sion of the chairman, the second and third provisos and insert after the word "Guard," in line 25, page 35, the words:

And the proceeds shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Strike out the second and third provisos and insert, after the word "Guard," in line 25, page 35, what I

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 35, line 25, by striking out all after the word "Guard" down to and including line 5, page 36, the two provisos, and insert "and the proceeds shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 35, line 23, after the word "authorized" insert "upon the approval of this act."

Mr. DENT. The object of that, Mr. Chairman, is to enable the Secretary to sell these surplus horses now and not wait until the 1st day of next July. They are eating their heads off down there now because the department is without this authority

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That not to exceed the sum of $18,000 of the above amount may be used for the construction, including plumbing, heating, lighting, etc., of a chapel at the Presidio of San Francisco, Cal.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the proviso.

Mr. McKENZIE. By inserting the word "and" after the word "heating" in line 7, page 37, and by striking out in the same line the words "and so forth."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKenzie: Amend, by inserting the word "and" after the word "heating," on line 7, page 37, and in the same line by striking out the words "and so forth."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry under the reservation of the point of order as to whether it is intended to expend a greater amount than the $18,000 herein authorized?

Mr. KAHN. It is not. It was estimated for by the department, but it would have to come out of this appropriation, and therefore the department advised this special proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any chapel of any kind whatsoever on the Presidio at the present time?

Mr. KAHN. There is a building there, but it is a wooden shack. The Presidio will be occupied by about 4,000 men, and Fort Winfield Scott, adjoining, by a thousand men when the troops are all at those posts. The present chapel is situated in the officers' section of the Presidio. It is a rough plank shack, partly overgrown with ivy, and it is altogether unworthy the Government. The Presidio is visited annually by thousands of people from all over the country. I take it that in a large post like that the Government of the United States ought to have a chapel that is worthy the dignity of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. What has been the policy as to erecting chapels at other posts of the pretentious character that is proposed here?

Mr. KAHN. This is not going to be a pretentious one. It is going to be merely a substantial one.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Government has erected chapels at other posts?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.
Mr. MONDELL. The Government erected a chapel at a cost of upward of $20,000 at Fort Yellowstone, that I recall. I think others have been erected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That $9,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, in addition to the above sum, for the necessary alterations and additions to buildings at Jeffersonville depot of the Quartermaster Corps, for the installation of machinery for the manufacture of clothing.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 37, line 18, strike out the words "is hereby appropriated, in addition to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of." In line 19, strike out the comma after the word "sum" and insert the words "may be expended."

Mr. DENT. That is for the same purpose as the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of forced by the gentlement from Alphana.

ment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLAYDEN: On page 37, after the word "clothing." in line 22, insert:
"Provided further, That the limit of cost of the nurses' dormitory at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., be increased to not more than $30,000, including the heating and lighting fixtures, which sum shall be paid from the appropriation for 'Barracks and quarters,' in the bill for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in November, I think it was-either in November or about the 1st of December-the Quartermaster Corps determined to construct, in connection with the hospital and medical service at Fort Sam Houston, a dormitory for the nurses; barracks for the nurses, in other words. Bids were invited on a design which, I am assured by the medical officers of the War Department and the officers of the Quartermaster Corps, is economical and reasonable and intended solely to accommodate these employees of the hospital service.

Under the law no building can be constructed under such circumstances that costs more than $20,000. It is an old statute, section 1136 of the Revised Statutes, dating from ante-Civil War days. The bids that were submitted exceeded that amount by so much that new bids were invited. A few days ago these new bids were opened. The lowest bid for the building that is required is $29,983, thus exceeding by the sum of $9,983 the amount for which the Quartermaster Corps, without coming to Congress for relief, would be authorized to spend in the construction of the dormitory,

I have here a memorandum, dated February 20, 1917, from Gen. Sharpe, Quartermaster General, in which he says:

Bids have just been received from San Antonio for the construction of the nurses' dormitory in connection with the hospital at Fort Sam Houston, Tex. The lowest bid received was $29,983. Inasmuch as it is impossible to reduce the cost of construction below this figure, the building can not be built except by authority of Congress, in relew of Revised Statutes 1136, which limits the cost of buildings which can be constructed without the authority of Congress to $20,000.

If this building is to be constructed it will therefore be necessary to obtain the authority of Congress to increase the limit to $30,000 in order that award may be made to the lowest bidder.

Sufficient funds are already available and no additional appropriation need be asked for.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SLAYDEN. In a moment. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have asked, in the amendment which the Clerk read, that this sum be authorized to be expended out of the appropriation for the current fiscal year; that is, the appropriation bill which will expire by limitation on the last day of June, 1917.

Now I yield to the gentleman from California. Mr. KAHN. I take it from the gentleman's statement that it was intended to build these quarters out of the current appropriation?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is; and that is what I ask.

Mr. KAHN. You are simply asking-

Mr. SLAYDEN. For authority to increase the limit, as provided in the amendment, because it is impossible to get a building that will accommodate the nurses without it. Gen. Gorgas called me up this morning and assured me that this was a very necessary appropriation, and that they were needing the building now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Can the gentleman state how many nurses it is proposed to accommodate?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am sorry to say that I can not.
Mr. ANTHONY. I feared that this was another evidence of the industry of my friend from Texas in raiding the United States Treasury for Fort Sam Houston. I want to give him credit for having been very successful in the past along those lines

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his very flattering observation about my industry in connection with Fort Sam Houston. I have had an excellent example to follow. The gentleman's success on behalf of Fort Leavenworth is one of the marvels of the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. But forced into insignificance in comparison to the gentleman's efforts on behalf of Fort Sam Houston.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am pleased to hear the gentleman's testimony, but am compelled to ask for further evidence.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The reservation of the point of order against the amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Slayden].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction, repair, and maintenance, military and post roads, bridges, and trails, Alaska: For the construction, repair, and maintenance of military and post roads, bridges, and trails, Territory of Alaska, $500,000.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that item, upon the ground that it is not authorized by law.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will have the statute here in a moment. Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I have examined the statute to which the gentleman refers, and the only provision made for expenditures by these road commissioners created under that act is the fund diverted from the collection of taxes in Alaska. As I read the act there is no authority for the appropriation of money out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, in opposition to the point of order I call attention to the fact that volume 33, Statutes at Large, page 616, and volume 34, Statutes at Large, page 192, provide specifically for this work to be done under the United States Army officers. It establishes the commission that is to do the work and lays out the kind of work that is to be done in the development of Alaska.

Mr. GORDON. How does it provide that the funds shall be

Mr. CALDWELL. The act provides that-

The cost and expenses of laying out, constructing, and repairing such roads and trails shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury through the authorized disbursing officer of the board designated by the Secretary of War quit of the road and trail portion of said Alaska fund upon vouchers approved and certified by said board.

Mr. GORDON. Exactly. The Alaska fund is raised by a tax upon certain industries in Alaska.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe there can be no question that the gentleman from Ohio is correct in his exposition of the law, so far as this item is concerned. I took occasion to examine the statute myself before the gentleman raised the point of order, and under that statute the revenues for the work on these Alaskan roads under the board of road commissioners shall be derived from the Alaska fund which is raised by taxation in Alaska. There is no authorization whatsoever for this appropriation. Further, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs have no jurisdiction over appropriations pertaining to the roads of the country, especially since we provided a Committee on Roads, which has jurisdiction of all matters relating to the construction and maintenance of roads but not the appropriations Of course, this provides an appropriation, not only for a military road but for post roads and trails. The Chair may not be able to take judicial cognizance of the fact that this is not a military road, but merely a commercial highway connecting the little by-towns scattered here and there throughout the Territory of Alaska. The testimony before the committee shows that the main road has been completed and that they are planning to build a bridge and to connect some little towns up there in the wilderness, 150 miles west of the proposed railway. For those two reasons I think the point of order should be maintained.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to say anything further?

Mr. CALDWELL. This appropriation has been carried in the Army appropriation bill every year since 1906. We have appropriated money for this purpose every year. The work is going on. We have work partially completed there that must be completed. It is under the general statute appointing a board for the purpose of doing the work, and they are only carrying out the policy of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The fact that appropriations have been made from year to year in an appropriation bill does not make a continuance of such appropriations in order if the appropriation was ever out of order.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I call the attention of the Chair to page 984 of the hearings where there appears a letter from Col. Richardson, colonel of Infantry, who is in charge of the work under the board of road commissioners for Alaska, and he says this:

When this item—present fiscal year appropriation—was reached in the discussion of the Army appropriation bill, the following colloquy, in part, took place on the floor of the House (Congressional Record, June 26, 1916, p. 11508, second column):

"Mr. Stafford. It is not a beginning of a wholesale project for the construction of roads in Alaska where the military necessity is very far-fetched.

"Mr. Hax. As I understand from the officer who has charge of the road construction, this amount would about complete the roads and military trails."

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] being there present, on hearing the thing discussed, apparently yielded to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Upon the assurance of the then chairman of the committee, Mr. Hay, who perhaps had been misled; and if the gentleman is familiar with the hearings and will read further he will see I am correct in stating that it was understood that that appropriation of $500,000 was to complete those roads. Now, they come before Congress again for another $500,000. did not yield. My position was the same a year ago that it is

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But the gentleman did not make the point of order then.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; on the assurance then that that appropriation would complete all the roads necessary. Now, they come and ask for another appropriation.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to contend that this appropriation is in order? If he does, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. KAHN. I hope the point of order will not be insisted on. The situation in Alaska is very peculiar. There are no private property owners there to speak of. The Government owns nearly all the land. These roads are built from one mining camp to When a discovery of gold is made in any new camp another. a force of soldiers is sent to that camp. The soldiers are scat-tered throughout Alaska. They are stationed at practically every mining camp, and the supplies for these soldiers have to be carried to them over the roads which really are a military necessity.

In view of that fact I hope that this appropriation will be continued. Gen. Richardson, in that letter that was referred to by my colleague, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Greene], speaking of the testimony taken last year, says on page 984 of the

A wrong impression had inadvertently been given, I regret to say, to the chairman of the committee, as indicated by his remarks above quoted, due, I think, to the fact that I had stated that the present appropriation would virtually complete the Valdez-Fairbanks Military and Post Road upon which the board has been engaged for several years past. The Ruby-Long-Coast Road, referred to in the hearing, lying to the westward of the Government railroad line, and constituting with the railroad and the Valdez-Fairbanks Road the three great trunk lines through central Alaska, is just begun. A third trunk-line wagon road is needed across the Seward Peninsula from Nome northward.

The CHAIRMAN. There is but one question here, and that is the point of order.

Mr. FIELDS. We are hoping that the gentleman from Ohio will not press his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made. There is no reservation of the point.

Mr. FIELDS. Did not the gentleman from Ohio reserve the point of order?

Mr. GORDON. No.
The CHAIRMAN. This question does not present any difficulty from a parliamentary point of view. No one has pointed out any authority of law under which this appropriation is to be The statute cited segregates a fund from which payments on road account are to be made, thereby making it sufficiently clear that the Committee on Military Affairs has no jurisdiction to make the proposed appropriation. The fundamental law for Alaska provides a fund for the construction and repair of roads in that Territory. The Chair sustains the point

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Line 21, page 38, insert the following:
"Protection, repair, and maintenance of military post roads, bridges, trails, Alaska: For the completion, repair, and maintenance of military post roads, bridges, and trails, Territory of Alaska, $500,000."

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not authorized by law.

Mr. KAHN. It was authorized by the law of last year, and therefore my amendment refers to the completion of the work already inaugurated.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that prevents them from going ahead and completing it out of the fund provided by law for the completion of these roads. They have already expended over $2,000,000 of money collected from the industries of Alaska. There is no possible objection, without any legislation by Congress, to the road commissioners going ahead and completing any work that has been started out of the funds provided by law. The United States Treasury is not a source to which they may resort to complete it.

Mr. CALDWELL. We passed a dry law a few days ago that takes all that fund away.

Mr. GORDON. No; this money comes from fisheries and other sources besides that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that a member of the Committee on Military Affairs should undertake to do by indirection what he can not do by direction, and certainly when it is stated in the hearings that this work is not in continuance of any work in progress, but is for the construction of a new road.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am discussing the point of order, and I direct the attention of the Chair to page 982 of the hearings, so that the Chair may be enlightened as the members of the committee were enlightened by the hearings, showing that this appropriation is for a trunk-line wagon road across the Seward Peninsula. Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is well settled in the practice of the House that work undertaken by the Government may be completed, and that appropriations for the completion of a work in progress are in order. This is a work in progress, a work undertaken by the Federal Government. The provision in the bill was for additional construction, and therefore was subject to a point of order. The amendment as presented by the gentleman from California provides simply for the completion of a work already undertaken. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] suggests that other work may be con-templated. Undoubtedly other work was contemplated under the provision in the bill; but no new construction can be undertaken under the language of the amendment offered by the gen-

The work already undertaken and tleman from California. now in progress, partly completed, can be completed; and an amendment for that purpose is clearly in order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin fails to gather from the hearings, page 890, that they are still working on the uncompleted road.

Mr. STAFFORD. For which they have an appropriation for the present fiscal year.

Mr. KAHN. No. Col. Richardson, in a statement in regard to this, says it is not embraced in this year's report, which was for 1916. He says it was spent very largely on the Valdez to Fairbanks main wagon road and beginning a new road, or, rather, extending the road already begun from the town of uby. So they are working on additional roads. Mr. STAFFORD. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that you can not bring this amendment within that rule of continuing a work in progress, and I call the attention of the Chair to the decision cited in the Manual. An appropriation in violation of existing law or to extend service beyond a fixed limit is not in order as a continuation of public work, and it cites two authorities in the precedents.

Mr. MONDELL. I call the Chair's attention to the fact that this is not an appropriation in violation of any law.

Mr. GORDON. The Chair has already ruled upon that, if I understood the ruling of the Chair. The act which has been cited as authority for this appropriation specifically provides that the funds to be used under the direction of these road commissioners shall be collected in Alaska.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes there is a very great deal of difference between a lack of authorization and a pro-vision of law prohibiting a thing being done in violation of law.

Mr. GORDON. I understand in this country that we have undertaken to subordinate the military to the civil authority, and among other things it is provided that you can not appropriate money unless it is authorized by law. I think this is a good place to apply that doctrine, and the Chair seems to understand it very clearly.

Mr. MONDELL. The expenditure is authorized by law when a work is undertaken. This is simply an appropriation to complete it.

Mr. GORDON. Where is there any authority of law to undertake any work?

Mr. MONDELL. It has been under way for a number of

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no; they have just been building roads and trails up there wherever convenient.

The CHAIRMAN. Before ruling the Chair desires to ask a question. Is this appropriation intended to complete a scheme of roads which the engineers have in mind?

Mr. KAHN. I understand it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Or is it to complete one or more roads, on which work has been begun? Have the engineers undertaken to outline a system, or scheme of roads for construction in

Mr. KAHN. There has been a scheme or system, but they have been working on various branches of those roads.

The CHAIRMAN. On parts of the system?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, but they have not completed the roads. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to challenge Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to challenge that statement of the gentleman. Either he was not present when these hearings took place or else he has forgotten the hearings. The testimony of Col. Richardson which I have read shows conclusively that there is no system of roads involved, that it is just money to be used for patchwork here and there connecting the little villages.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair for the purpose of ruling will accept the statement made by the gentleman from California. This of course is an attempt to apply the principle of a work in progress, to this scheme of proposed roads.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In the first place, the Chair will say that there has been a tendency to narrow the application of that principle. But entirely apart from that tendency, the committee which proposes to appropriate for a work in progress should have some original authority in that connection. This authority is entirely lacking in this committee in the present connection. If there is any authority anywhere to appropriate for these roads, as a work in progress, that authority is not found in this committee. Under the act which the Chair has read this committee is not authorized to make appropriations for the Alaskan roads. A special fund for the construction of these roads is provided in the Alaskan act. That provision does not give the right to this committee, either by virtue of the principle of a work in progress, or on any other ground, to appropriate for the roads in question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair yield to me there?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a certain law referred to under which roads may be built in Alaska out of the Alaskan fund, but the existence of that statute does not prevent the Government from entering upon the work of building some roads in Alaska, contemplated under that act, by direct appropriation. Congress begun this two or three years ago.

Mr. KAHN. Ten or twelve years ago.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not informed when the appropriations were first made, but Congress can complete the construction of certain of these roads by direct appropriations. Those appropriations have been running along, certain roads have been undertaken and they are in an uncompleted state. It does not involve the completion or building of all of the roads in Alaska It does not that might be built in Alaska, but the completion of certain roads that have been undertaken under these appropriations, and in the absence of any objection being made at the time, Congress on this bill could take these provisions for the beginning of those roads, and after those roads were undertaken and underway it is in order to offer an appropriation to complete that work in progress.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the Chair if he has referred to the act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes, approved January 27, 1905?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair a moment ago referred to the tendency being to limit the application of the principle of making appropriations for work already in progress. In that connection I desire to read a citation which has just been handed to me:

But later decisions, in view of the indefinite extent of the practice made possible by the early decisions, have ruled out propositions to appropriate for new buildings in navy yards.

What could be a larger application of this principle than to hold that if this board has outlined a large scheme of road construction in Alaska, and done some work here and there in connection with the same, this committee, or any committee, thereby authorized to appropriate the funds necessary to complete every road contemplated by that scheme or project?

In the act which the Chair has cited, section 29, there is an elaborate provision for road construction in Alaska by a board to be composed of an engineer officer of the United States, two other officers, and so on. At the close of that section it is specifically stated that the cost and expense of laying out, constructing, and repairing these roads and trails in the Territory shall be paid by the disbursing officer out of the "roads and trails" portion of the Alaskan fund. The Chair thinks that the point of order directed to this paragraph is well taken, and it is therefore sustained.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to the previous item. I was called to the telephone when this paragraph was read, and I would like to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to recur, for the purpose of offering an amendment, to the previous paragraph. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, at the end of line 12, insert "Provided, That not exceeding $20,000 of said sum shall be used for the construction of macadam roads at Fort Riley, Kans."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved to the return and a point of order also is reserved to the amendment read.

Mr. HELVERING. Was the point of order reserved?

Mr. DENT. I reserved the point of order.

Mr. HELVERING. If the gentleman is going to insist on it,

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, it would be subject to the point of order, the gentleman realizes

Mr. HELVERING. Oh, certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the chairman of the committee reserves the right to make a point of order. I have no objection to the gentleman going ahead and discussing the item.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, this provision, if adopted, would provide for the construction of a macadam road on what is the east side of Fort Riley proper. Up to this time it has not been in an exact sense a military necessity, but we have pro-vided that there is to be held at Fort Riley, Kans., this year a series of military training camps, and these camps will be held on the east side of this reservation and this road will have to be used to get supplies to them. This road is part of the great golden-belt highway, and the civil authorities can not go on the reservation to make repairs, and the road has become washed out to such an extent that it is almost impassable. The topography of the country is such, the river on one side and the hills on the other, that no general transcontinental road could go any place through this part of the country except across the reservation, and inasmuch as the civil authorities can not go on this reservation to make these repairs, I think it but right and just that this road be kept in repair under this appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HELVERING. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the gentleman, the War Department has full authority to expend a portion of this fund on the road to which the gentleman refers explicitly in his proposed amendment.

Mr. HELVERING. Yes; they have that authority, but they have never seen fit to exercise it, and I want to make it so that they will

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will be establishing a bad precedent if he did that.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged to reserve a point of order, I would like to make a remark or two about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kan-That is, that there has spread over the land a great yearning for improved roads. Every section is trying to get all it can out of the Federal Government. Whatever is given to any particular locality there is just that much less left for other parts of the country. The gentleman from Kansas is no more interested in military establishments than are gentlemen from Maine or from Massachusetts, but gentlemen from Maine or Massachusetts do not ask for the improvement of this particular military road; that is urged only by the gentleman from Kansas. The reason is that his constituents do travel that way. We have entered upon a scheme of aiding the States in building public roads. If that policy is to be pursued, then the equitable, fair, and just method is to do it by a general ap-propriation fairly distributed among the States. There is a bill now pending to build a road from Washington to Annapolis, under the guise of a military road. A moment ago we disposed of amendments proposing so-called military roads in Alaska. I heard nobody say a word in favor of these schemes except gentlemen on the Pacific coast. They want to get some money out of the Public Treasury to build roads—branch roads that develop the country tributary to their own States. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be unjust to any scheme that may be presented; I should love to see these roads checker Kansas over-call them military roads, or post roads, produce roads, or whatever you choose-but if we permit these detailed appropriations to be made it results in a general unfairness to the rest of the country.

If the Federal Government is going to build roads or going to assist in building roads, let it be done by a general scheme, where every State and every community shall have its fair share. For that reason I think the point of order should be

Mr. HELVERING. Of course the gentleman understands that this particular road comes within the appropriation which will be made for this purpose. The State authorities could not go upon this reservation nor are the civil authorities allowed to go on and repair the road. We would be glad if the civil authorities were allowed to do so.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will say in response to that that I should be glad to see the gentleman have that road. I assume the travel over it would be more of a civilian than of a military character, and I can see where it would be of benefit to the constituents of the gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that under the bill introduced by himself and enacted by Congress recently, if the different States in which the Federal Government appropriates money and exercises supervisory power in the construction of highways, does not require as a condition precedent that those localities themselves shall contribute a substantial amount?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In reply to the gentleman's interrogation I will say that the purpose of these gentlemen is to get for the districts they have in mind something in addition to what the rest of us get under that general appropriation to which the gentleman from Ohio alludes. These gentlemen do which the gentleman from Onlo anddes. These gentlemen do not regard these special roads as military necessities. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Helvering], who asks that his road be improved, is not expecting that any great military emergency will call for the use of that road, but he wants the well-to-do Kansas people to drive their autos over it and the farmers to haul their produce over it. I do not blame these gentlemen, Mr. Chairman. I am not criticizing them. Roads are the foundations of civilization, and if by any hook or crook they can resort to they can get an additional road put in their districts, or their States, or in some territory tributary to their business, I see no particular reason to criticize them; but I think we would be subject to criticism if we permitted them to put across their schemes for special road favors not shown to the rest of the country. These gentlemen should remember that some of the rest of us are in the wilderness of bad roads. good roads are good things, then let us pass them around in the interest of equity and fair dealing.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of

The CHAIRMAN. It is clearly subject to the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands: Continuing the work of providing for the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, including repairs and payment of rents, the acquisition of title to building sites, and such additions to existing military reservations as may be necessary, and including also shelter for the animals and supplies, and all other buildings necessary for post administration purposes, and for shelter and repair thereof, and rentals for the United States troops in China, $500,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing a letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, dated February 10, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

GARDNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the document indicated.

Mr. ANTHONY. On what subject?
Mr. GARDNER. On the report of your committee.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 10, 1917.

Washington, February 16, 1917.

Sir: 1. The report of our committee, which accompanied Union Calendar No. 452, H. R. 20783, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session (Rept. 1432) stated that the total estimates, including supplemental estimates for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, were over $320,000,000. The amount appropriated for the last fiscal year was $267,596,530.10. The bill for 1918 carries an appropriation of $247,061,108.50. Attention is invited to certain legislation incorporated in the bill, and the committee ends its statement as follows:

"The committee has amply provided for reserve supplies of all kinds and, in its judgment, has sufficiently provided for the various features of the legislation adopted at the last session of Congress in behalf of national defense."

2. The estimates for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1918 were based upon the following:

(a) The support of the Regular Army, including the second increment authorized by the national-defense act June 3, 1916, of 8,147 officers and 160,852 enlisted men with the colors, and 25,000 enlisted men in the Regular Army Reserve.

(b) The support of the National Guard at an assumed strength of 10,307 officers and 230,253 enlisted men. These figures are based on the assumption that all organizations of the National Guard will be maintained at the minimum authorized strength fixed by the national-defense act,

(c) The assumptions that during the fiscal year 1918 the Officers'

the assumption that all organizations of the National Guard will be maintained at the minimum authorized strength fixed by the national-defense act.

(c) The assumptions that during the fiscal year 1918 the Officers' Reserve Corps will have a strength of 11,599; the Enlisted Reserve Corps 17,439; and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, 50,000; and that the attendance at training camps will aggregate 50,000.

(d) The construction of the additional accommodations required to house the Regular Army to include the first and second increments authorized by the national-defense act.

(e) The provision of one-fifth of the reserve stock of clothing required for a suitable reserve for 21 divisions of the Regular Army and National Guard.

(f) The accumulation of one-seventh of the amount of field-artillery material, including ammunition, to be procured under the project of the Treat Board.

(g) The accumulation of one-third of the automatic rifles remaining to be procured to complete the total of 12,000 required under the approved project.

(h) The accumulation of one-third of the small arms, small-arm ammunition, and other ordnance stores, remaining to be procured to complete the required supply for an army of 1,000,000 men.

(i) The accumulation of the aeronautical material remaining to be procured to equip the Regular Army, including all increments, and the National Guard.

(j) To provide for the expenses of the Council of National Defense.

3. The original estimates of the supply departments were carefully considered by a committee of the General Staff, and reductions made in the cash estimates of the Spansal amounts may result in defeat of the full development of the features of legislation enacted in the last session of Congress of the estimates above noted, it is seen that any further reductions in the original amounts may result in defeat of the full development of the features of legislation enacted in the last session of Congress in behalf of national defense. The purpose of Congress as set forth in the defen

Total	188, 843, 628, 23	155, 392, 458. 40	33, 451, 169. 73

It will be noted that the estimates for the Quartermaster Corps have been cut as shown above in the sum of $33,451,169.73. It will be impossible to properly provide for the Regular Army with the second increment added with the funds carried in the bill.

5. With respect to the appropriation of $100,000 for horses for Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineers, and the proviso reading:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell for cash at either public or private sale such horses and mules as are not needed for either the Regular Army or the National Guard: Provided further, That the proceeds arising from such sale may be used for the purpose of carrying out the provision of the foregoing item: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used until the funds arising from the sale of such animals shall have been first exhausted."

Attention is invited to the fact that unless sufficient funds are obtained from the sale of animals to provide pay for a large number of employees now in the service at remount depots commencing July 1, 1917, it will be necessary to discharge them and therefore to close the remount stations at Front Royal, Va., Fort Keogh, Mont., and Fort Reno, Okla.

1917, it will be necessary to discharge them and therefore to close the remount stations at Front Royal, Va., Fort Keogh, Mont., and Fort Reno, Okla.

6. With respect to the proviso in the appropriation "Transportation of the Army and its supplies":

"That of the amount herein appropriated not exceeding $15,000 may be used for extraordinary expenses of transportation of West Point cadets to Washington, D. C., to attend inaugural ceremonies, and return, which sum shall be immediately available."

Attention is invited to the fact that the letter of the Quartermaster General to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, dated December 30, 1916, stated that $20,000 would be required for this purpose.

7. The estimates of the Chief of Engineers were reduced as follows: Engineer operations in the field (pages 47-48): The amount of the estimate was $300,000. The bill carries $150,000; $150,000 will cover the expenses incident to normal peace-time engineer training of the Regular Army and Reserve Corps, and will leave a small amount for the purchase of reserve material for engineer operations in the field. The cut of $150,000 in this appropriation means a reduction by that amount in the stock of tools and materials which can be obtained and held immediately available for construction of field fortifications and similar engineer work. Investigation just completed shows conclusively that the materials, barbed wire, etc., can not be obtained promptly enough in the quantities required. It is, therefore, considered of the first importance to begin at once the accumulation of stock of these materials, as the total will be many times the amount of this estimate, and the beginning should be made as promptly as possible.

8. National Guard: The following reductions have been made in the estimates submitted for the support of the National Guard:

A provision for the expenditure of $20,000 to construct a machine-gun target range for the National Guard at Tobyhanna, Pa., was omitted entirely

The only item increased by the committee was that providing for attendance of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard at service schools. The sum of $150,000 is provided for this purpose, the estimate being only $100,000.

The estimate for the pay of the National Guard is included in the pay of the Army. The original estimate for this was $97,794,995.66; the bill as introduced carries $51,860,533.40, the difference being $15,934.402.96. $15,934,462,26.

Allowing for the necessary replacement of wastage by July 1, 1917, the Regular service will be at practically authorized strength, i. e., the first increment will have been provided.

Thus it is seen that if the large cut in pay is on the assumption that the Regular Army can not be increased in accordance with the provisions of the defense act, the assumption is incorrect. It seems that the large reduction is due to a belief that the personnel of the National Guard will be much below authorized strength during 1918. Undoubtedly this would be a fact, arguing from conditions as they existed a month ago. However, the present emergency has introduced new factors into the situation that may result in the National Guard being increased to authorized strength without trouble.

In view of the above it seems inadvisable to reduce the original estimates for the National Guard.

9. The following reductions have been made in the estimates of the Ordnance Department:

Appropriation.	Estimate.	H.R.20783.	Difference,
Ordnance service.	$425,000	$350,000	$75,000
Ordnance stores—ammunition	14,978,000	12,000,000	2,978,000
Small-arms target practice	2, 850, 200	2,000,000	850, 200
Manufacture of arms	7, 350, 000	6,000,000	1, 350, 000
Ordnance stores and supplies	16, 515, 000	10,000,000	6, 515, 000

Particular attention is called to the reduction in the estimate of $425,000 for Ordnance service to $350,000. The full amount estimated for should be appropriated. The following reasons will make this apparent:

apparent:
The appropriation under Ordnance service, 1916, was $325,000 for an Army of a total authorized strength of 104,100 officers and enlisted men. Since the 1916 appropriation was passed, labor and material have advanced as follows:
Labor, 10 per cent: material, 25 per cent.
Based on the assumption that 75 per cent of this appropriation is expended for labor and 25 per cent for material, for an Army of 104,100 men, the following amounts would be required at the present time:

Labor: 75 per cent of $325,000Add 10 per cent for increase	$243, 750. 00 24, 375. 00 inadequate to carry out the plans already made for experimental work and investigations. It is believed that in addition to the amount provided in the bill the original estimate should be added, namely, $200,000.

12. The amendment to the national-defense act proposed in lines 22-25, page 72, and lines 1-14, page 73, is not favored. Under its provisions officers of the National Guard might belong to the Officers' Reserve Corps and to the National Guard Reserve. Sections 77, 78, and 79 of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, make wise provisions for a reserve of the National Guard. The intent of Congress was clearly indicated as follows:

"Commissions of officers of the National Guard may be vacated upon resignation, * * Officers of said guard rendered surplus by the disbandment of their organizations shall be placed in the National Guard Reserve. Officers may, upon their own application, be placed in the said reserve."

the disbandment of their organization. Guard Reserve. Officers may, upon their own application, be placed in the said reserve."

The purpose of the Officers' Reserve Corps is stated to be to secure "a reserve of officers available for service as temporary officers in the Regular Army, * * as officers of the Quartermaster Corps and other staff corps and departments, as officers for recruit rendezvous and depots, and as officers of volunteers." The President was authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for an Officers' Reserve Corps of the Regular Army. These are embodied in General Orders No. 32, War Department, 1916. Army on the active list or of the National Guard or who is not a citizen of the United States."

The regulations prescribed by the President were intended to carry out what was considered the intent of the law, namely, that National Guard officers were not eligible under its provisions for commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps.

The enactment into law of the provision above quoted would probably result in a large number of colonels and lieutenant colonels who have had National Guard service receiving commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps. This would result disastrously both to said corps and to the compact of the colonels of the co

"Provided, That in the appointment of chaplains in the Regular Army preference and priority shall be given to applicant veterans, if otherwise duly qualified and shall not have passed the age of 41 years at the time of application, who have rendered honorable war service in the Army of the United States or who have been honorably discharged from such Army."

Section 12, act of February 2, 1901, provides that—

"No person shall be appointed a chaplain in the Regular Army who shall have passed the age of 40 years, nor until he shall have established his fitness as required by existing law."

The purpose of the proviso in the defense act is apparent. Since opportunity has been given for the appointment of chaplains under it there seems no serious objection to the amendment as proposed.

16. Of the remaining legislation the following deserves serious consideration. Under "Pay of the Army," pages 9 and 10 of the bill, is the following proviso:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any officer of the line of the Army who shall be appointed or promoted in violation of any of the terms next hereinafter specified: That of the whole number of officers of Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, Infantry, and of engineers serving with the enlisted force of the Corps of Engineers necessary to fill vacancies created or caused in said arms of the service by reason of the second increment, authorized by said arms by act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, not more than one-fourth shall be appointed or promoted until, exclusive of enlisted men belonging to said arms on June 30, 1916, at least one-fourth of the second increment of enlisted men authorized for said arms by said act shail have been enlisted; not more than one-half of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least one-half of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted; and not more than three-fourths of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least three-fourths of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted. And all officers promoted in accurdance with the terms of this proviso shall take rank, respectively, from the dates on which their promotions shall have become lawful under the terms of this proviso."

The effect of this proviso if enacted into law will be to increase the authorized commissioned personnel in proportion to the increase in the enlisted personnel.

The first increment will be practically complete at the close of the current fiscal year, a marked improvement when compared with the vacancies at the close of the last fiscal year, when there were nearly 26,000 vacancies in the enlisted strength. If the proposed proviso is enacted into law but one-fourth of the officers provided for the line as the second increment by the national-defense act can be appointed at the beginning of the year. The second fourth would probably be available about September 30, 1917, the third fourth about December 31, 1917, and the last quarter about March 31, 1918.

Assuming that 25 per cent of the commissioned second increment under the provisions of the bill will be added July 1, 1917, and 25 per cent each quarter thereafter, the dif

the last session of Congress in behalf of the national defense. The War Department would be handicapped by the enactment of the proposed amendment.

The necessity of trained officers in any efficient military force has been accentuated by the developments of the present European war. Applications for commissions should be encouraged and the large number of young officers necessary should be secured as soon as possible after July-1 in order that they may receive the training required to fit them for their duties. The experience of the past year shows that these new officers can not all be obtained at any one time. The effect of the amendment, therefore, would be largely confined to a retardation of the new units required would be largely confined to a retardation of the new units required would be adversely affected. The orderly procedure by which the framework of new organizations of the first increment was constructed from the Regular officers and enlisted men already in service and sending to these organizations recruits as received might have to be departed from if the amendment is enacted into law. The development of the first increment was not seriously interfered with by the lack of new men at first. A certain amount of time was found necessary to perfect the organization and to get ready for the training of the new material. It would be a serious blow to the Military Establishment to have to depart from the methods perfected by the experience of last year.

17. Attention is called to the fact that certain remedial legislation considered necessary to supplant the defense act of June 3, 1916, has not been included in H. R. 20783.

18. It is recommended that appropriation be made for the Military Establishment under the various headings of H. R. 20783, Sixtyfourth Congress, second session, to the amount of the original estimates except in the case of the Office of the Chief Signal Officer. The amount appropriated in the bill, namely, $9,000,000, is considered sufficient, since a large part of the original e

That there be substituted for the proviso, page 72, lines 1 to 11, the following:

"Provided further, That the provisions of section 5 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, relative to restrictions of the employment of General Staff officers in and in the vicinity of the District of Columbia and the assignment of officers to duty in the Office of the Chief of Staff are hereby repealed."

That in case it is impossible to secure the omission of the proviso, page 9, lines 24 and 25, and page 10, lines 1 to 23, it should be amended to read as follows:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any officer of the line of the Army who shall be appointed or promoted in violation of any of the terms next hereinafter specified; that of the whole number of such officers necessary to fill vacancies created or caused by reason of the second increment and authorized by the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, not more than one-fourth shall be appointed or promoted until, exclusive of enlisted men belonging to the line on June 30, 1916, at least one-fourth of the said increment of enlisted men authorized for the line by said act shall have been enlisted; not more than one-half of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least one-half of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted; and not more than three-fourths of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least three-fourths of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted; not more than one-half of said increment shall be made in each grade of each branch in the manner prescribed by existing law for the entire increment, and all officers promoted in accordance with the terms of this proviso shall take rank respectively from the dates on which their promotion shall have become lawful under the terms hereof."

The purpose of this amendment is to prevent promotion in each arm under the enactment from being Difficulties would attend the execution of the law as now given in H. R. 20783, and confusion would result. Further inequalities in relative rank between the line and Staff Corps would result and be objectionable even under the amended proviso. Therefore it is strongly urged that the original proviso be omitted and not amended.

19. Herewith are data concerning estimates, fiscal year 1918, and the state of our military supplies.

Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Longworth: On page 48, line 2, strike out "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$140,000, and that section 124 of an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, is hereby repealed."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to repeal section 124 of the nationaldefense act, the act which authorizes the expenditure of $20,-000,000 for the acquisition of a nitrate plant.

Gentlemen will observe that up to now none of that money has been expended, and that no site has been chosen, and no recommendation made. Therefore the effect of my amendment, if adopted, will be to save to the Government of the United States $20,000,000 that I regard as a useless expenditure of the public

I have not changed my opinion, gentlemen, expressed re-peatedly on the floor of this House, that this legislation pro-vided in section 124 of the national-defense act is bad legislation. Further developments have even strengthened my belief that of all the extravagances perpetrated by this, the most extravagant Congress, I fear, in history, this nitrate plant is the most wanton and unjustifiable.

My opinion is confirmed rather than shaken by the receipt of a pamphlet which I hold in my hand, which I assume most Members have received, entitled "America's Gibraltar, Muscle Shoals." I find on the title page of this pamphlet my name engrossed in letters of gold. I do not know, gentlemen, whether to feel flattered or mortified by having my name thus inscribed. I do not know whether it is put there in a spirit of Christian forgiveness or in ironical acknowledgment of the futility of my opposition, continued opposition, to this proposition, or whether it is put there in ignorance of the fact that I ever opposed it at all. I fear that the latter is the more probable, because I have observed that, outside, possibly, of the Bible alone, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is the book least read by many of our successful business men, or some of them at least. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska. Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman says it may be submitted in an ironical way. Does not the gentleman mistake the metal? Is it not submitted in a golden way?

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have only a few minutes. I do not want to delay the committee. I want to make a few remarks about this publication. It is prepared and sent out by what is known as the Muscle Shoals Association, and represents one of the activities of as tireless and efficient a lobby as I have ever seen since I have been in Congress. Strenuous efforts were evidently made to enlist all possible support, because I find on page 8 of this pamphlet that even my State has been invaded. I find that Galion and Lancaster, Ohio, through their chambers of commerce, have indersed this proposition. I remember that they tried to raid the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, but I am glad to say that that body withstood the blandishments of the Muscle Shoals Association.

Now, the principal argument that is made in this magnificent brochure, at least the surface argument, is that the Muscle Shoals from a preparedness point of view is the best fitted locality for this nitrate plant, but after you read below the surface you see something else than the question of preparedness. In the beginning, in their foreword, this sentence occurs:

We are confident that we can demonstrate that the South offers an exceptionally suitable site on the Tennessee River for the proposed plant.

And in the very next sentence they let the cat out of the bag

In addition the establishment of the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals will remove the last obstacle to the unimpeded navigation of the Tennessee River, and will provide water transportation to a great section of country, thus completing a necessary and long-delayed water improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I have five minutes more? This is an important question, and I have not occupied any time at all on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there ob-

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How could there be a more complete acknowledgment of the truth of what some of us have been saying all along, that the preparedness plea used in this nitrate scheme has been a fake from the outset, and that the object of it has been simply to accomplish by indirection what they failed to accomplish by direction? For a number of years this Muscle Shoals water proposition has been before Congress. It tried to get in through the front door of Congress on its own merits with an appropriation of $60,000,000, but it has failed to do that, and now comes in through the back door for a $20,000,000 proposition to erect a nitrate plant. I have not time to recite in detail some of the ridiculous propositions in this publication, except to say generally that their arguments in favor of developing this water power and establishing this nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals in the interest of preparedness for the national defense of the United States are entirely conclusive arguments why this water power ought not to be developed and a nitrate plant established there.

For instance, after laying stress on the need for producing nitrogen in this country-with which proposition I entirely agree—they make this statement. Now note, my friends:

Germany, Italy, France, Norway, Sweden, Austria, Canada, and Japan have established large factories for taking their nitrogen from the atmosphere, and have devoted a million continuous horsepower solely to this industry.

Now, I ask any gentleman in this House if, outside of Norway and possibly Canada, he can name one place where one ounce of nitrogen is made by the use of water power? I challenge any gentleman to point out one.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield for a brief question. Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be possible to manufacture all the nitrogen that we need without the investment of a dollar of the public money? Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely; and I will go on and prove it.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?
Mr. LONGWORTH. If I have a little time to do so, I will.
Mr. QUIN. I do not want to disconcert the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield to the gentleman a little later, after I have developed this thought. Almost in the next sentence they say, apparently by way of hitting the nail on the head:

Germany alone since the beginning of the war has developed an air-nitrogen industry requiring 300,000 continuous horsepower at a cost of more than $100,000,000. As a result of this notable enterprise she is independent to-day of all outside sources of nitrogen and will apparently continue so throughout all time.

Now, what can be said, gentlemen, of an argument in favor of establishing a water-power site for the manufacture of nitrogen which uses as an illustration the immense success of a nation which manufactures unlimited nitrogen without the use of one ounce of water power? Such an argument is based either on abysmal ignorance or bad faith, and whichever horn of the dilemma you take it defeats itself. Further on, in advocating that there should be but one nitrate plant in the country, and that that should be built at Muscle Shoals, forsooth, we find this statement:

Andrew Carnegie says, "Put all your eggs in one basket and watch that basket,"

In other words, they advise us to wager our national existence, accordance to their argument, on one dam. Constantly using Germany as an argument, they either do not know or hope we do not know that Germany had at the beginning of the war at least six large nitrate plants, and probably to-day has infinitely more.

A little later, in summing up the requirements for a site to produce nitrogen they say that one requisite is

Two hundred thousand horsepower, which must be available 90 per cent of the time throughout each year, to cost not more than $5 to $10 per horsepower, if we are to produce at home in successful competition with Norway where water power is available at $3 to $5 per horse-

Again, they do not know, or they hope Congress does not know, that Germany formerly controlled the entire water-power site at Norway and sold their interests there for the avowed reason that other and cheaper methods had been discovered of producing nitrogen out of the air. But here, for sooth, they ask us to appropriate $20,000,000, and we have done it, and now is your opportunity to rectify it, to develop a water-power site that on their own statement is 100 per cent more expensive than the water power that has been put out of business so far as manufacturing nitrogen by Germany is concerned.

Indefensible, as I always believed the nitrogen-plant scheme to be from any point of view, it is made all the more indefensible by the argument of these men who expect to profit by it in a personal way. It is not too late to rectify the mistake we made last summer; it is not too late to save our bankrupt Treasury from further needless drawings on its resources,

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If it is a good power to develop the nitrate plant, would it be any objection to it that it incidentally improved the navigation of the river as the rivers of the gentleman from Ohio have been improved?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am not opposing the scheme because it is a water-power development on the Tennessee River. If it was proposed here on its own merits, and was not a proposition to get money under false pretenses, I do not say that I would

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. There are no false pretenses about it. Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely; they say it is necessary for preparedness. Will the gentleman tell me how Germany makes nitrogen without using water power?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If I knew, I would.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They do; and they make unlimited quantities.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We do not make it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.
Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Where and how?
Mr. LONGWORTH. From Chile saltpeter and by several other methods. The gentleman better look up his facts a little What I am advocating is that we shall not expend $20,-000,000 for one water-power plant, when I have conclusively shown that every other nation in the world, except possibly Norway, is making their nitrogen by other means better and

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not true that other nations are making it at a greater cost than they could with water power?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then why did Germany abandon the water-power site in Norway, the cheapest place in the world?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is perfectly apparent she did not want her nitrate to come from Norway any more than we want to have ours come from Chile.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why did she sell her interest in the syndicate before the war? Because they had discovered cheaper i and better methods. The gentleman does not know about the situation

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I have not read the paper to which the gentleman from Ohio refers

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will present the gentleman with my

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the gentleman, and I have no doubt that it is a good document. However, I want to say that this nitrate plant has been ordered to be established for the purpose of giving this country a supply of nitrogen to make explosives for our necessary protection in time of war. Our supply now comes from another country. At present we have to go to Chile to get the saltpeter with which to make the explosives Manifestly, if our country ever gets into trouble, we must have some method of making nitrogen within our own borders. What is the best method? The gentleman says that we could follow Germany's example and have it done by steam power. I differ frankly with the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I never said anything about steam power. There are four or five different methods of manufacturing nitrate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am afraid the gentleman has not read up on it. The experts have told us, the experts who came before our committee, engineers from the Army, have said that it could be manufactured more cheaply by water power than any other way

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We had but one before us.

Mr. McKELLAR. And he was a most accomplished man, the leading expert in the whole country on that subject. want to say the nitrate plant has not yet been established on the Tennessee River. I sincerely hope it will be, because I believe it is the best place in this country for this plant, and it will furnish more power than any other place. It might be established in the State of the gentleman from Ohio, if he had the necessary power, and if it was there he probably would not oppose it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would oppose it very much, because I do not believe in that kind of legislation under any circumstances.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I have looked up the legislation and I have found that the gentleman never opposed any improvement on his rivers. He has been in favor of all Ohio River appropriations. I think the record will bear me out that he has uniformly voted for improvements on all the rivers in his own State. The mere fact that incidentally if this nitrate plant is established on the Tennessee River it will open up that entire river to navigation is no objection to it. It is absolutely apparent that the Government needs nitrate and needs to manufacture it in our own country. It needs to be done in the cheapest manner possible. It is believed from expert testimony that it can be done by water power cheaper than by any other method, provided we can get water power in sufficient quantity. It is understood that on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals you can get more water power than anywhere else in the country, unless it be at some place in Oregon very near the coast and outside of the safety zone. There is no doubt whatever about the Muscle Shoals being the ideal place in all the United States for the location of this plant. That is why these gentlestates for the location of this plant. That is why these gentlemen down there on the Tennessee River have believed that this was the proper place for it. Now, I say this because I do not believe that the plan to establish this nitrate plant upon the Tennessee River is subject to the criticism that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Longworth] has seen fit to visit upon it, and if the point of order has not been made, I make the point of order against the amendment, because it is not a germane amendment, Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the point of order. I maintain that my amendment is entirely in order under the Holman rule. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact-and I am glad to call the attention of this particular Chairman to this question, because he has ruled recently in a very able ruling upon this precise point-that the Holman rule makes legislation on an appropriation bill in order, provided it fulfills two requisites: First, that it is germane, and, second, that it reduces expenditures. This item to which I have offered this amendment is the item which provides for the payment of Army engineers to build such dams, and so forth, as are required under section 124 or may be required under section 124 of the national-defense act.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH, Yes.

Mr. GORDON. You could repeal the whole Army reorganiza-tion act of 1916 under that same rule. Mr. LONGWORTH. I am not asking to do that,

Mr. GORDON. But you could do it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am not asking to do it and I do not want to do it, but I do want to repeal this section of it. There is no question that it is germane to this paragraph providing the expenses of the Army engineers. I call the attention of the Chair to section 124 of that act which authorizes the President to make such investigations as he may deem necessary to determine a proper method of manufacturing nitrogen, to investigate all methods of manufacture or method of producing it by water power contained in this country, and the act provides that he is further authorized to construct, maintain, and operate at any site or sites so designated docks, locks, improvements to navigation, power houses, and other plants and equipment or other means than water power as in his judgment is best and cheapest. Suppose the President chooses water power as the best method of producing nitrogen and determines on one location? It is out of this particular item that expenses to Army engineers will be paid. It is out of this particular item they have been paid hitherto in making their investigations as to water-power sites, and in making this particular investigation at Muscle Shoals. Further on the law provides that the products of such plant shall be used by the President for military and naval purposes, thus bringing it clearly under the purview of the military defense of the Nation. The law also provides that the President is authorized and empowered to employ such officers, agents, or agencies as may in his discretion be necessary to enable him to carry out the purposes herein specified, and to authorize and require such officers, agents, or agencies to perform any and all of the duties imposed upon him by the provisions of the act. The fact is that Army engineers are to-day—and I have this from the Chief of Engineers—investigating water-power sites in this country under this section 124 of the national-defense act.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.
Mr. DENT. The gentleman does not contend that the Army appropriation bill takes care of the appropriations for the engi-meer work done on rivers and harbors?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, certainly.

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

That is taken care of in the rivers and harbors bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it is taken care of in this bill also. Mr. DENT. This particular item refers to engineering operations in the field.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is broader than that—such expenses as are ordinarily provided for depots, "civilian assistants to Engineer officers," and "maps, War Department." Under this item are paid some of the expenses incident to the examination of these water-power sites. There is no question in the world

Mr. Chairman, under the ruling of the present occupant of the Chair this precise question was determined. I shall read one or two extracts from that. The gentleman now presiding said, as reported on page 500 of the Manual:

The purpose of the Holman rule is most beneficent and proper, and it should have a liberal construction in the interest of retrenchment.

In other words, the Chairman thinks, and properly so, that amendments offered under the Holman rule should be construed broadly if they are in the interest of retrenchment. Further on the Chair states:

In this connection the Chair will state that it is not necessary for an amendment to be in order that it should be specifically directed to a reduction in terms of an amount carried in the bill. Of course, if it is addressed to such an amendment and reduces the same in terms, it will be in order, as, for instance, if the sum of $1,000,000 is appropriated for a designated purpose pursuant to the requirements of existing law, and an amendment is submitted limiting this amount to $995,000, such an amendment will be in order.

That is precisely what I have done in this case. I have reduced the amount in this bill by $10,000. That will save to the Treasury, if my amendment is adopted, directly $10,000, and furthermore will save to the Government $20,000,000 the amount authorized to be provided for in the issuance of bonds to build this nitrate plant. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that both the essentials as laid down by the Chair in his decision are met, and that my amendment is in order because it is germane on its face, and as a necessary consequence it reduces not only the expenses provided in the bill, but generally the expenses of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, on page 1085 of the hearings Capt. Barber gave a specific statement. If the chairman has the hearings before him, he will find on that page a statement as to what this item is for. They ask $300,000, and had a very much larger amount last year for operations in the field because of the border trouble. This does not carry any appro-the bottom of that page. It does not carry an appropriation at all for this purpose, and of course the amendment is not germane to it because it has nothing to do with it, according to the testimony of Capt. Barber, who testified in the hearings.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, is the Chair ready to rule? I reserved the point of order, and I believe it has been made; but I make the point of order that it is new legislation and not germane to this paragraph or any other section in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Longworth] contains two parts, one a proposition to reduce the amount appropriated in the bill from $150,000 to $140,000, the other a proposition for the repeal of a section of existing law. It is insisted that this amendment is in order under the Holman rule. The Chair has had occasion heretofore to construe this rule on various occasions, and in these rulings has been disposed to give the rule a liberal interpretation. But this latitude of interpretation has never been stretched to mean that a motion to reduce an appropriation, makes in order an unrelated and ungermane proposition of accompanying legislation. The principles announced in the decisions cited do not support the contention that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, is in order. The motion to reduce the gentleman from Ohio, is in order. The motion to reduce the amount appropriated, is in order without regard to the accompanying repealing legislation. It is plain that the proposed reduction does not flow from the proposed legislation. It is not in any wise related to it, much less a necessary product of it. It is in order as a separate proposition on its own merits, and the fact that it is coupled with unrelated legislation, does not operate to make that legislation in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I interrupt the Chair at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What would be the necessary result if this nitrate scheme be repealed? Would it not be that the Government would be under less expense investigating this whole proposition and spending money to pay Army engineers' expenses therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will proceed to answer the query of the gentleman.

Mr. FIELDS. The engineers doing river and harbor work are not appropriated for in this bill. They are 21 in number, and they are appropriated for under the river and harbor till, as is stated in the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be the effect of the legislative part of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, if adopted? The answer is that this repealing amendment, if adopted, would effect a great reduction of general expenditures, but it does not follow therefrom that this legislation is therefore in order, as an amendment. What is the connection between the two propositions embraced in the amendment? As pointed out heretofore, they are unrelated, while the precedents require that there must be some necessary relationship between the legislation proposed and the reduction to be effected in the expenditures comprehended in the bill under consideration. The amount carried in the bill can be reduced by a motion to that effect, which as an independent proposition will be in order. This reduction relates to the expenditures in the bill. But the reduction intended to be effected by the repealing legislation is outside of the bill. The Holman rule requires that amendatory legislation on an appropriation bill must not only effect a retrenchment in the expenditures carried in the bill but must be germane to the bill. To what language in the paragraph under consideration is the proposed legislation germane? In this connection the Chair will call attention to the language of the paragraph-

For expenses incident to military engineer operations in the field, including the purchase of material, etc., and such expenses as are ordinarily provided for under appropriations for engineer depots, civilian assistants to engineer officers, and "maps, War Department."

How can it be argued that a proposition of legislation which proposes to repeal the nitrate plant section of the act of 1916 is germane to the language cited? It has already been pointed out that an independent proposition of legislation can not by mere association with an unrelated proposition to reduce an item in a bill be thereby rendered in order. If this proposition of legislation effected the reduction proposed and was germane to the bill under consideration, it would fall within the principle of the Holman rule, and be in order. Plainly, however, this legislation is neither germane to the paragraph nor related to the motion to reduce the appropriation in the bill from $150,000 to $140,000. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

very much larger amount last year for operations in the field because of the border trouble. This does not carry any appropriation at all, according to Capt. Barber, whose testimony is at

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I take it under existing law the proceeds from any public utility now goes into the Treasury as a miscellaneous fund?

That is the way I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. What special reason is there for these funds that accrue from the operation of public utilities to be used for the purpose of appropriations so that Congress will have no control over their expenditure? This is along the line of objection I raised some time ago to a similar provision.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands what this provision

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking information.

Mr. MANN. We have in various places—it was an old controversy and finally settled against my judgment possibly—where we are really creating a public utility for the benefit of the Army, and furnished service, light, for instance, washing, or something of that kind—washing might not possibly be the case-but providing for those things, and this merely allows them to use the money that comes in from private concerns to help pay the expenses of this utility.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the purpose, and that is the spe-

Mr. MANN. That is what it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. My objection would not apply to it.

Mr. MANN. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the gentleman will look at page 1091 of the hearings, he will find the whole thing set out there by

Mr. STAFFORD. Along the line suggested by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. McKELLAR. Exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of

The Clerk read as follows:

Military surveys and maps: For the execution of topographic or other surveys, the securing of such extra topographic data as may be required, and the preparation and printing of maps required for military purposes, to be immediately available and remain available until December 31, 1918: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to secure the assistance, wherever practicable, of the United States Geological Survey, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, or other mapping agencies of the Government in this work, and to allot funds therefor to them from this appropriation, $200,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph. What is the necessity of letting the War Department go into the business of making topographical surveys? Why can not the Geological Survey make them?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the gentleman this is what Gen. Black says about it—

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that they made a statement before the committee, but I want to know the reason why the Geological Survey can not furnish this information. We make an appropriation of several hundred thousand dollars for the

Geological Survey

Mr. McKELLAR. They furnish information as to the maps, but those maps do not carry the military information that is desired, and in order to complete them it is required that the Engineer Department of the Military Establishment shall take the maps made by the Geological Survey and complete them, the maps made by the Geological Survey and complete them, showing all the military features of the ground. That is the way that Gen. Black explained it to the committee.

Mr. MANN. The fact is the Geological Survey gets an appropriation in the sundry civil bill of several hundred thousand dollars—I do not recall the amount—and the Army intends to do the same work in some places where the Geological Survey to the control of the Geological Survey to has not done it, when it is the duty of the Geological Survey to give preference to the Government needs in those places. This is merely an effort to get $200,000 more for the Geological Survey, which it can not get through the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FIELDS. The testimony was this, that the Geological Survey does not complete the military maps, but that the military forces take up the work where the Geological Survey leaves off and bases its work on what the Geological Survey has already done and completes from that the military maps.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the Geological Survey has not made a survey where the Army wants to make it, then who is going to

Mr. FIELDS. I suppose in that case the Army would make it. Mr. MANN. That is the principal purpose of it. The Army want surveys all over the country. If there is any place where the Geological Survey has not made a survey, instead of asking the department to make the survey they propose that the de-partment shall go ahead and make surveys where the Government does not want it and have the Army make it where the Government does want it. It is an effort to get $200,000 appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the gentleman that that is the position I took before the committee, and I am not going to complain if he makes the point of order.

Mr. CRAGO. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I want to say this, that this department takes the survey maps made by the Geological Survey and puts on those maps additional information, which is confidential. Now, that is what was represented to us.

Mr. FIELDS. Strictly military.
Mr. CRAGO. Strictly military information, which is not to go out to the public, but which is kept by the War Department. And they work in connection with the Geological Survey

Mr. FIELDS. And they save the expense of doing all the work that the Geological Survey does that is not needed.

Mr. MANN. If the Geological Survey has made the survey, there actually is not much more information to acquire. They even furnish the cow paths, the huts, and everything on the What more is there to learn?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will yield, I will say that it is the testimony of the Engineer Department that the particular military information they desire is not on the map.

What information could they want?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As to whether the bridges and culverts will carry artillery; whether it is a suitable place for a camp; or whether it has all those requirements for commanders handling troops in the field.

Mr. MANN. They show whether it is forest or swamp land, whether it is uphill or not, how high it is, and whether it is rocky, and everything else. They furnish that information on these maps of the Geological Survey. Has the gentleman ever taken the trouble to travel around the country with one of those Geological Survey maps in his pocket?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No. But I take the testimony of the Chief of Engineers, who says that information is not on the map and that he has to put additional information on those maps; and he wants money voted to make those maps so that they can be available. And I will say further—

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. I have seen this work being done. They have been doing that work in my neighborhood; that is, year before last. Now, the old Geological Survey maps were not upto-date. They had to have parties from the Army Engineers going around all through Cape Ann in Massachusetts in order to find where the new roads were, to find all the changes that have taken place since 1884, which was the last date of the Geological Survey maps

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I just wanted to read here one part of the testimony of Gen. Black. I read:

There was this difference, Mr. Kahn: Our maps were evidently so confidential and the information contained in them was so confidential that we proposed to print these ourselves on the press you gave us last

In other words, they consider the information they had so confidential that they proposed to print it themselves, and inasmuch as the maps were of that character we felt warranted in giving them the money that they ought to have in order to carry out the plan to secure the information they said they ought to

Mr. MANN. I have been appealed to very strongly by some of the civil engineers of the country to be in favor of this proposition, because it simply added $200,000 more for the making of topographical maps, just as the Geographical Survey is now doing. I think they know about it.

Mr. CRAGO. The new information contained on these war maps is more valuable than the information that was on the original maps.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, the committee went to the engineer station at Washington Barracks here and saw what the Engineer Department was doing in connection with these maps. They get the maps originally from the Geological Survey and the Coast and Geodetic Survey. the Geological Survey and the Coast and Geodetic Survey. They buy them originally from those surveys, and then they have their engineers out in various parts of the country surveying the roads that might be used for military purposes and taking cognizance of every condition that might be useful in case of military operations. The map looks entirely different when the engineers have finished it. There is twice as much information on the map as there was when they first got it from the surveys,
Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that these maps are to be for the exclusive use of the Army?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I say they are to be for the confidential use of the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are to be for the confidential use of the Army, and not to be distributed to the public generally?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely. Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the plan of the Committee on Military Affairs that the country should be placed on a war footing, so that the War Department should know every nook and corner of the country in case of invasion from this or that imaginary foe?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is the purpose of the War Department to prepare these military maps as rapidly as they can be made. It was stated before our committee that if we were engaged in war now we would find that other nations have better military maps of our own country than we have. That has been the case with respect to other countries, so that we have recommended this appropriation so as to start a proper system of military maps for our country.

Mr. KAHN. I have not relinquished the floor yet.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. KAHN. The portion of the country that has been surveyed for this purpose is exceedingly small. They have just made a beginning along some of our coasts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do they plan surveying the interior of the country-Illinois and Indiana?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.
Mr. STAFFORD. I have no fear of a military invasion of my State or the interior of the country. I am not afflicted with hysteria about any contemplated invasion of this country. I would like to inquire whether the War Department has made any estimate as to the total expense that would be involved when this work is completed?

Mr. DENT. It was not brought out before the committee in these hearings

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. This will be a continuing appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will be an enlarging and a continuing appropriation?

Mr. DENT. It will be a continuing appropriation, and per-haps larger. As I recall it, outside of the Texas border and a few points on the Atlantic seaboard, practically no map work has been done at all, so that if we begin this work it will be very expensive, I will state in fairness to the gentleman from Wisconsin

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think we should have some estimate of the complete cost before launching on it in this way?

Mr. DENT. I think that would be necessary before we completed the scheme; yes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman. Mr. TILSON. I wish to make a statement, Mr. Chairman. It has been my lot and duty as an officer to use these very maps that we are speaking of here. They are founded upon the Geological Survey maps, or the Coast Survey maps, or the Lake Survey maps, as the case may be, and upon these maps is placed the military information that is considered to the contract of the contr the military information that is considered to be necessary for military operations. The maps that I used on the Mexican border, or the part of the United States adjacent to the Mexican border-

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the character of the information that is added to these topographical maps of the Geological Survey?

Mr. TILSON. Well, I was going on to tell the gentleman. One thing is cleared or cultivated ground, fields that could be used for landing places for aircraft. Another thing is the character of the water supply. Another thing is the character of the roads with reference to military uses. Another is the nature of the fences. A number of other things are put on. In fact, the character of the terrain generally that is not shown by the topographical lines or otherwise on the ordinary Geological or Coast Survey maps.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TILSON. Yes.
Mr. BENNET. The gentleman has had military experience in the last year?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I have.
Mr. BENNET. Is it the gentleman's experience from practical use that these maps do contain information that the ordinary United States Geological Survey maps do not contain?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and when prepared these maps are given out with the legend "Confidential" marked on them. Each commanding officer has to take account of the maps confided to him and be responsible for the return of them. I know, because I happened to be one of the commanding officers who had to be responsible. Personally I had to gather up those maps and return them to the Engineer Office. They are entirely confidential.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did the department have these maps with the territory along the border marked when the gentleman went down there?

Mr. TILSON. We had to wait several weeks before we could get them.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman use them?
Mr. TILSON. I did.
Mr. MANN. For what?
Mr. TILSON. For maneuver purposes.
Mr. MANN. I do not see what information there would be on them for maneuver purposes more than would be on a topographical map.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes; we were in a country with which we were not acquainted. It was important to know such things, even for camping purposes.

Mr. MANN. I have traveled through mountainous and wooded country many times with one of these topographical maps on my person.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman did not have to select military sites for defensive purposes

Mr. MANN. I do not think they had to down on the border,

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think it is important to know how to do it.

Mr. MANN.

They did not select them.

ORD. This seems to be putting the country on the Mr. STAFFORD. basis of an armed encampment. The chairman of the committee says he has no information as to the total amount that may be involved in the work that is proposed under this item. It seems that the War Department has had no difficulty in getting this information and placing it on topographical maps so far as the border is concerned. I am informed that other appropria-tions are available for this work and that provision will be carried in another bill. I think until we have further information the matter should go over.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment? I wish to state that while we are lacking in many things to put us in a state of preparation, we are lacking more in these maps than in any other one thing that I know of. There are only a few parts of the country of which these military maps have been made.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will yield on that point, is it not a fact that there is but one map, covering one county near Laredo, and that a topographical and geological map of the country from the Gulf of Mexico to the Great Bend, above the mouth of the Pecos River along the Mexican

Mr. TILSON. I can not answer that. I only know that on the particular part of the border where I served we had these progressive military confidential maps.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. These folios cover only a very few, possibly not more than 20, counties in the whole State of Mr. TILSON. I was informed by military men that there were very few of them comparatively, and that we were very much behind in the preparation of military maps of the country.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let me read from Gen. Black's own statement made to the committee a year ago:

The maps are pretty fair in the States where there are Geological Survey maps. When you get south of the Potomac you find almost none along the coast. Down at Charleston when we tried to get up a map of the territory back of the coast the latest we could get was a map prepared in 1863 by the Confederate engineers engaged in the defense of Charleston.

In the South, where we have been making maps lately, we wrote to the governor of South Carolina and to the governor of Georgia and to the governor of Florida, saying: "Please send us all the maps you have." They said they were sorry to say they had none of any kind. They said, "We would be glad to cooperate, but we have nothing." There are almost no Geological Survey maps for that section. So it has gone.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under what appropriation are they making these maps to-day?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Under such appropriations as have been carried in the bill for military map-making purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a new item. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tilson] states that the War Department has had these maps-

Mr. TILSON. Let me tell the gentleman how they made them on the border. They had a small force of engineer officers. The officer in charge sent through all the National Guard regiments and asked for the detail of every officer and man who was capable of making maps, drafting, or anything of that kind. They took officers and enlisted men from the National Guard organizations in order to assist the small engineering force to make these maps. Probably there was no expense, so far as the making of the maps was concerned, other than the regular pay of the Army officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman insists on the point of or-The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Ordnance service: For the current expenses of the Ordnance Department in connection with purchasing, receiving, storing, and issuing ordnance and ordnance stores, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, and advertising, stationery, typewriters, and adding machines, including their exchange, and office furniture, tools, and instruments of service; for incidental expenses of the Ordnance Service and those attending practical trials and tests of ordnance, small arms, and other ordnance stores; for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office; subscriptions to periodicals, which may be paid for in advance; and payment for mechanical labor in the office of the Chief of Ordnance, and for purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, $350,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 50, line 2, after the figures "$550,000," insert the following: "Provided, That hereafter mileage to officers of the Ordnance Department traveling on duty in connection with that department shall be paid from the appropriation for the work in connection with which the travel is performed."

Mr. DENT. I reserve a point of order. I did not catch the wording of the amendment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee will not press the point of order. would simplify the bookkeeping in the Ordnance Department. We have had a great many complaints in our committee and on the floor of the House that you do not know how much some things cost. Whether that is true or not, I am not here to argue that point, but unless the expense that is incurred is carried to the proper account you do not know. This proviso simply places where it should be placed the expense that is incurred in the Ordnance Department,

The Secretary of War sent to our committee the following statement in regard to this provision. It was asked for by the Ordnance Department, and, in a letter published as House Document No. 1950, was transmitted to our committee with the recommendation of the Secretary of War that it be put in the bill. This is what he says:

recommendation of the Secretary of War that it be put in the bill. This is what he says:

The act approved April 23, 1904 (33 Stat., 267), states:
"Provided, That hereafter * * all allowances for mileage shall be made solely from the sums herein appropriated for such purposes."

This has been decided by the Comptroller of the Treasury to apply to all acts making mileage appropriations. So far as pertains to the Ordnance Department, this provision results necessarily in difficulty concerning the procurement of material, its inspection, and its development. It quite generally happens that after the first half of the fiscal year the total appropriation for mileage of officers is considerably reduced and that thereafter the relative needs of the entire service must be considered in issuing travel orders. It thus occurs that inspection trips and work in connection with development and procurement of war supplies are curtailed in the Ordnance Department, or altogether omitted, to the disadvantage of the Government, because of other needs which are more pressing but entirely unrelated to the duties of that department. A more businesslike method would be in accordance with the commercial practice which would authorize the payment of actual traveling expenses or of mileage to ordnance officers from the appropriations in connection with which the travel is incurred. This would result in charging against each class of war material the proper expenses in connection with its procurement, which is not now done. It would also considerably facilitate promptness, since the Chief of Ordnance or an arsenal commander could direct the necessary travel to be performed, as should be done. At present if an arsenal commander finds travel of an officer necessary he must submit a request to the Chief of Ordnance, which must be forwarded to The Adjutant General of the Army, pursuant to which, if approved, a travel order must be issued and sent to the officer through the Chief of Ordnance, in the usual routine, which, as a rule, takes from

That is the provision I have submitted.

Mr. DENT. What is the gentleman reading from—a letter of the Secretary of War?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

I reserved the point of order really because my attention was distracted at the moment and I did not catch the reading of the amendment. I will ask that the gentleman's amendment be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again port the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire from what item these officers are now paid?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They are paid out of the general fund, but they have to get it from the Auditor General's Department. It is not charged against the Ordnance Department at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the fund from which it is taken a specific fund or transportation?

Mr. MANN. It includes mileage.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It includes mileage; in this case if they were to travel to inspect field artillery it would be charged to Field Artillery, and then you would know how much it cost. The way you are doing business now you do not know. It is simply to cut a little red tape out of the machine.

Mr. DENT. If I understand the amendment, it means that the mileage expense is to be taken out of each appropriation instead of the general mileage appropriation. For the officers of the Army

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is right. If they are going to buy machine guns and they travel to inspect them, they pay for it out of the appropriation, so that we will know what it costs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the committee know how much was being spent for transportation? Would not the committee be confused as to how much was to be expended for the total transportation?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; not necessarily; because we could always trace it back.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will have to make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores, ammunition: Manufacture and purchase of ammunition for small arms and for hand use for reserve supply, ammunition for burials at the National Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C., ammunition for firing the morning and evening gun at military posts prescribed by General Orders, No. 70, Headquarters of the Army, dated July 23, 1867, and at National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and its several branches, including National Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C., and soldiers' and sallors' State homes, $12,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Page 50, line 13, strike out the figures "$12,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$14,978,000."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this amendment brings us to the very brass tacks of preparedness. You have heard a great deal in the last year or so about preparedness. Ninetenths of what we have heard concerns the enlistment of the personnel of the Army. As a matter of fact, if we would pay nine-tenths of our attention to ordnance we would come nearer being ready when called upon for defense.

The lesson we learn from history and the lesson we learn from the European war is that ordnance is the very foundation of all preparedness. You have in this country an opportunity to prepare your ordnance for defense. You have five great working pare your ordnance for derense. Low have going to, and I arsenals that are to-day unmanned. I am not going to, and I arsenals that are to-day unmanned. Everybody is to blame that has had anything to do with this. If war comes to this country within the next one or two years, the first thing that will develop will be a shortage of munitions, and I call your attention to it now. When you come to go back and find out who is to blame you will find that it is the men who have not given this department the money and authority that they asked for. They are the ones to blame, and unless they vote for this amendment it will be easy to place the blame in the future

Now, the time to correct that is to-day. You have an opportunity now.

The amount that I have proposed here is the exact amount that the War Department, the Ordnance Department, the General Staff, and the Secretary of War have asked for. Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. For what purpose does the gentleman understand the appropriation is to be expended?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Manufacture and purchase of ammunition for small arms is the main thing, and the rest concerns some things for reserve supplies. The most of it is ammunition Without ammunition you can not defend the for your rifles. country.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DENT. As I understand the gentleman, his amendment provides the total amount suggested by the Ordnance Department, and that includes authorization contracts, does it not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DENT. The Ordnance Department asked the Congress to give it authority to make purchases, so that Congress would be bound in the next appropriation bill to carry it out. The Military Committee turned down all those requests for authoriza-

Mr. KAHN. The amount estimated for this particular item was $12,930,000, and the committee decided to give them $12,000,000.

Yes; we reduced it just that amount and cut Mr. DENT. out the authorization.

Mr. GARDNER. Was not there a supplemental estimate? I call attention to page 5 of the letter of the Secretary of War, which states that the estimate was $14,978,000, and the House allows $12,000,000, a difference of $2,978,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. In this bill the Committee on Military Affairs has made drastic reductions in all the ordnance items far below the estimates made by the Secretary of War. It will be just as well to discuss all these reductions together instead of taking them up one by one.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. While Secretary Garrison was still in the War Department he instituted what was known as the Treat Board. The Treat Board consisted of a number of officers who were charged with the duty of reporting on the amount of field artillery and field-artillery ammunition which we ought to accumulate against the possible outbreak of war. The Treat Board submitted its report last year, but subsequently its figures were a good deal cut down before they were finally approved by the Secretary of War. The board recommended us to accumulate field artillery to the amount of $154,057,310 worth and fieldartillery ammunition to the amount of $170,000,000 worth, in order to give us a sufficient supply till we could manufacture more in case war should break out. [Exhibit A.] Under the plan adopted by the Secretary of War these reserves of artillery and ammunition were to be accumulated in the next seven years, and it was proposed that each year we should appropriate enough money to pay for one-seventh of the amount needed.

Accordingly, last fall the Secretary in his estimates asked

Congress this year to appropriate in this bill $14,000,000 for field artillery and $12,200,000 for field-artillery ammunition. Instead of acceding to this very reasonable request the committee proposes in this bill that we shall appropriate only $10,000,000 for field artillery and $10,000,000 for field-artillery ammunition. A glance at the Secretary's letter of February 10, which I shall print with these repurely shows conclusively the which I shall print with these remarks, shows conclusively the folly of this and similar parsimony in the matter of machine guns, and so forth. [Exhibit D.] The War Department also decided that we ought to accumulate 12,000 machine guns in the next three years. The Secretary divided the total necessary appropriation by three and recommended us to appropriate $19,139,000 for machine guns in this year's bill. The committee unluckily felt otherwise about the matter and has cut this sum down to $7,350,000. A similar criticism applies although by no means to an equal degree to the committee's action with regard to small arms and small-arms ammunition; that is to say, to rifles and to machine-gun and rifle ammunition. According to the plan of the War Department the necessary small-arms reserve for an Army of 1,000,000 men was to be accumulated within three years.

These estimates which the Secretary of War submitted to Congress as imperatively necessary to supply us with ordnance of all sorts, antiaircraft guns, rifles, cannon, ammunition, and so forth, amounted to $94,362,200 for this year. In lieu of that amount the bill which we are considering provides only $58, 960,000. In other words, the amount is a little over $35,000,000 by which the Military Committee has cut down the Secretary of War's estimate of our necessities in the matter of ordnance. When this bill was reported by the committee the Secretary of War wrote a letter of protest to the chairman. I shall print it in connection with these remarks.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Have we any antiaircraft guns?
Mr. GARDNER. We have a few in the Navy, but none, I think, in the Army. This bill carries a provision for $250,000 for antiaircraft guns, but according to the estimate of the Secretary, $1,000,000 is needed.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.
Mr. KAHN. The Chief of Ordnance stated to the committee that he had not yet developed a proper antiaircraft gun, and that is why the committee cut down the amount.

Mr. GARDNER. Be that as it may, on February 10, after you reported your bill, the Secretary of War wrote you a strong protest against the committee's parsimony. He says, among

The original estimates of the supply departments were carefully considered by a committee of the General Staff and reductions made in the cash estimates of $33,537,311.98. From an examination of the bases of the estimates above noted it is seen that any further reductions in the original amounts may result in the defeat of the full development of the features of legislation enacted in the last session of Congress in behalf of national defense. The increases in the military forces now provided require additional expenditures. In addition it is known that there is a great deficiency in reserve supplies required for national defense. These deficiencies can only be made good by the abundant use of national funds. (Exhibit D.)

Mr. Chairman, there is a very serious reason and a fairly good answer which Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, would undoubtedly give if you were to ask him why it is that we are so slow in accumulating even that small amount of artillery and ammunition for which we have already appropriated the money. Unquestionably he would point out that the law forbids him to purchase any considerable part of the needed supplies. Most of the ordnance he must manufacture. In the very next paragraph of this bill, for instance, you will notice that not more than one-third of the sum appropriated for small arms and ammunition shall be expended in the purchase of those articles. Whenever in this bill such a restriction appears I propose to offer an amendment leaving the questions of purchase or manufacture to be determined "in the discretion of the Secretary of War." There you have one of the lesser reasons why we can not go ahead and accumulate our ammunition and our artillery, although, of course, the chief reason is that we never have been willing to spend the money. I hold in my hand a series of let-ters from the Secretary of War or from Gen. Crozier, written within the last few months in response to questions which I submitted. Among other questions, I asked how many 6-inch fieldpieces we have. On October 5, 1916, the Acting Chief of Ordnance replied that we have only forty-two 6-inch fieldpieces, all howitzers. [Exhibit B.]

I asked Gen. Crozier how many field guns we own bigger than 6 inches in diameter. On November 25, 1916, he replied that we have just one gun larger than 6 inches in diameter—a 7.6-inch howitzer. [Exhibit C.] He said that a 9½-inch howitzer and a 12-inch howitzer are under design. [Exhibit B.] By the way, that same 91-inch howitzer was under design over two years ago, according to the general's testimony on December 8, 1914, before the Committee on Military Affairs. The general's letter of November 25, 1916, tells us that we have, not counting mountain guns, actually completed only 742 field guns. Seven hundred and forty-two field guns are considerably less than Russia had a dozen years ago in the Battle of Mukden, and everyone knows that, compared to the European warfare, the Russo-Japanese War was almost a pacifist conferwarfare, the Russo-Japanese value of the Russo-Japanese value of the Russo-Japanese value of the Russo-Japanese value value value of the Russo-Japanese value valu ammunition actually completed. That amount is less than three-quarters of the amount of artillery ammunition which, according to the press, was expended in a single day by Great Britain in her advance on the Somme last July. In other words, on a small section of a single front in Europe our entire stock of ammunition would have kept the artillery of the attacking forces supplied for three-quarters of a day.

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, January 23, 1917.

Washington, January 23, 1917.

Hon. A. P. Gardner,

House of Representatives.

Dear Sir: Replying to your letter of January 15, 1917, requesting certain data with regard to the contents of the Treat Board report, the following information is furnished, the questions asked in your letter being repeated for convenience:

First. What is the total amount and total value of Field Artillery which ought to be accumulated in anticipation of the possible breaking out of war?

Nine hundred and seventy-eight firing batteries.
One hundred and seventy-six ammunition batteries; value, including harness, $154,057,310.

Second. How much of this requisite has actually been completed according to your latest available figures?

One hundred and eighty-three and one-half firing batteries completed; value, including harness, $18,025,902.

Third. How much of this requisite has been authorized and appropriated for over and above the amount completed?

One hundred and forty and one-half firing batteries and 17 ammunition batteries authorized and appropriated for; value, including harness, $19,188,670.

Fourth. What is the total amount and total value of Field Artillery ammunition which ought to be accumulated in anticipation of the possible breaking out of war?

Seven million four hundred and fifteen thousand rounds; value, $170,000,000.

Fifth. How much of this requisite has actually been completed according to your latest available figures?

Seven hundred and seventeen thousand five hundred rounds completed; value, $10,289,300.

Sixth How much of this requisite has been authorized and appropriated for over and above the amount completed?

One million five hundred and nine thousand five hundred rounds authorized and appropriated for over and above amount completed; value, $22,860,700.

Seventh. What is the total amount and total value of machine guns which ought to be accumulated in anticipation of the possible breaking out of war?

Seventeen thousand two hundred and eighty-three machine guns required, per recommendations of the machine-gun board, 1916; value, $49,694,450.

Eighth. How much of this requisite has actually been completed according to your latest available figures?

One thousand three hundred and twenty-five machine guns on hand, serviceable, although not of the adopted type. These will be replaced by adopted type as soon as available; value, at price of adopted model, $3,771,000.

Ninth. How much of this requisite has been authorized and appropriated for over and above the amount completed?

Four thousand seven hundred and twenty-five guns complete, with the exception of certain articles which can be obtained more quickly than the guns, can be procured from funds available; value, $10,221,000.

The Treat Board report did not consider the number of rifles to be accumulated in anticipation of the possible breaking out of war. The answer to question No. 10 is based on the number of rifles which out to be accumulated by the act of Congress approve Twelfth. How much of this requisite has been authorized and appropriated for over and above the amount completed?

One hundred and ten thousand rifles authorized and appropriated for over and above the amount completed; value, $3,200,000.

Respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

Hon, A. P. Gardner,

Representative in Congress,

Hamilton, Mass.

Dear Sir: 1. I have your letter of October 2, 1916 (O. 0, 000.71/692), addressed to Gen. Crozier, and in his absence I am furnishing you with the information requested therein. The number of 6-inch fieldpieces completed to date is 42. These are all howitzers. One 7.6-inch howitzer, with its carriage, has been completed and has been undergoing test for several months.

2. A 91-inch howitzer and a 12-inch howitzer are under design, but none of either has been completed.

E. B. Babbitt,

EXHIBIT C.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, November 25, 1916.

Hon. A. P. Gardner,

House of Representatives.

Dear Sir: 1. I have your letter of November 21, 1916 (O. O. file 000.71/751), and the following is the information requested therein:

I. One 7.6-inch howitzer, with its carriage, has been completed and is undergoing test. This is the only mobile artillery cannon larger than 6 inches in caliber actually completed.

II. There are actually completed and in the possession of the United States, exclusive of the 7.6-inch howitzer referred to above, 742 field guns and carriages of modern types and 609,000 rounds of ammunition therefor. This does not include the 2.95-inch mountain guns with which part of the service is equipped and for which there is a reasonable supply of ammunition on hand.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM CROZIER,

Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance.

WILLIAM CROZIER, Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance.

EXHIBIT D.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 10, 1917.

Washington, February 10, 1917.

Sir: 1. The report of our committee, which accompanied Union Calendar No. 452. H. R. 20783, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session (Rept. 1432) stated that the total estimates, including supplemental estimates for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, were over $320,000,000. The amount appropriated for the last fiscal year was $267,596,530,10. The bill for 1918 carries an appropriation of $247,061,108.50. Attention is invited to certain legislation incorporated in the bill, and the committee ends its statement as follows:

"The committee has amply provided for reserve supplies of all kinds, and, in its judgment, has sufficiently provided for the various features of the legislation adopted at the last session of Congress in behalf of national defense,"

2. The estimates for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1918 were based upon the following:

(a) The support of the Regular Army, including the second increment authorized by the national-defense act June 3, 1916, of 8,147 officers and 160,852 enlisted men with the colors and 25,000 enlisted men in the Regular Army Reserve,

(b) The support of the National Guard, at an assumed strength of 10,307 officers and 230,253 enlisted men. These figures are based on the assumption that all organizations of the National Guard will be maintained at the minimum authorized strength fixed by the national defense act.

(c) The assumptions that during the fiscal year 1918 the Officers Reserve Corps will have a strength of 11,599; the Enlisted Reserve Corps, 17,439; and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, 50,000; and that the attendance at training camps will aggregate 50,000.

(d) The construction of the additional accommodations required to house the Regular Army to include the first and second increments authorized by the national-defense act.

(e) The provision of one-fifth of the reserve stock of clothing required for a suitable reserve for 21 divisions of the Regular Army and National Guard.

(f) The accumulation of one-seventh of the amount of field-artillery material, including ammunition, to be procured under the project of the Treat Board.

(g) The accumulation of one-third of the small arms, small-arm ammunition, and other ordnance stores, remaining to be procured to complete the required supply for an army of 1,000,000 men.

(f) The accumulation of the aeronautical material remaining to be procured to equip the Regular Army, including all increments, and the National Guard.

(g) The accumulation of the aeronautical material remaining to be procured to complete the required supply for an army of 1,000,000 men.

(g) The accumulation of one-third of the small arms, small-arm ammunition, and other ordnance stores, remaining to be procured to complete the required supply for an army of 1,000,000 men.

(g) The ordinal estimates of the supply departments were carefully considered by a committee of the General Sta

It will be noted that the estimates for the Quartermaster Corps have been cut as shown above in the sum of $33,451,169.73. It will be impossible to properly provide for the Regular Army with the second increment added with the funds carried in the bill.

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell for cash at either public or private sale such horses and mules as are not needed for either the Regular Army or the National Guard: Provided further, That the proceeds arising from such sale may be used for the purpose of carrying out the provision of the foregoing item: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used until the funds arising from the sale of such animals shall have been first exhausted."

Attention is invited to the fact that unless sufficient funds are obtained from the sale of animals to provide pay for a large number of employees now in the service at remount depots commencing July 1, 1917, it will be necessary to discharge them and therefore to close the remount stations at Front Royal, Va., Fort Keogh, Mont., and Fort Reno, Okla.

Particular attention is called to the reduction in the estimate of $425,000 for Ordnance service to $350,000. The full amount estimated for should be appropriated. The following reasons will make this for should be appropriated. The following reasons will make this apparent:

The appropriation under Ordnance service, 1916, was $325,000 for an Army of a total authorized strength of 104,100 officers and enlisted men. Since the 1916 appropriation was passed, labor and material have advanced as follows:

Labor, 10 per cent; material, 25 per cent.

Based on the assumption that 75 per cent of this appropriation is expended for labor and 25 per cent for material, for an Army of 104,100 men, the following amounts would be required at the present time:

Labor:

75 per cent of $325,000Add 10 per cent for increase	$243, 750. 00 24, 375. 00
Material: 25 per cent of $325,000 Add 25 per cent for increase	81, 250, 00 20, 312, 50	101, 562, 50

Total for Army of 104,100 at present _____ 369,687,50

In other words, the sum of $369,687.50 would be required under the appropriation Ordnance service, 1918, if the Regular Army had remained at the strength at which it was before the increase authorized by the act of June 3, 1916.

The estimate of $425,000 is based on providing the funds required for the maintenance of the Regular Army, including the first and second increments, or a total of 167,035 officers and enlisted men—an increase of 62,935, or approximately 60 per cent. If the appropriation be passed at $425,000, it would mean a net increase of 30 per cent above the amount appropriated for the Regular Army before the addition of the two increments—this 30 per cent to offset an increase of 60 per cent in the strength of the Army.

An examination of the above table will show that if the amounts of the original estimates are not restored the military resources of the country, in so far as munitions, stores, and supplies are concerned, will not be satisfactorily developed during 1918 on account of lack of funds.

the original estimates are not restored the military resources of the country, in so far as munitions, stores, and supplies are concerned, will not be satisfactorily developed during 1918 on account of lack of funds.

The bases for the estimates of the Ordnance Department are given in paragraph 3 above. To make the reductions indicated will result in increasing the time necessary for the accumulation of the supplies listed. Since these supplies can be procured under the best of circumstances only after considerable interval (in some cases amounting to a year or more), it is apparent that the amounts of the original estimates should be restored in the bill.

10. Office of the Chief Signal Officer: The original estimate under this heading was $16,600,000, and the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1917 was $14,281,766. The amount carried in the bill is $9,000,000. Of the original estimates $1,000,000 was for the Signal Corps proper and $15,600,000 for the aviation section. In the bill $1,000,000 was allowed the Signal Corps proper and $8,000,000 the aviation section. Of the amount estimated for the aviation section, $4,800,000 was carried to and appropriated for in the fortifications bill, so that the reduction really amounts to $2,800,000.

On consultation with the aviation section it is learned that the development of this important branch of our military service will not be seriously affected by the cut.

11. Council of National Defense: The estimate for the expenses of the Council of National Defense is $200,000. In the bill this is cut out and it is provided that the unexpended balance remaining on hand June 30, 1917, of the appropriation of $200,000 appropriated by the cat approved August 29, 1916, shall be available and that of this appropriation $5,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the rent of officers in the District of Columbia.

On consultation with the office of the Council of National Defense, it is learned that the amount provided for 1918 is considered entirely imadeq resignation, * * . Officers of said guard rendered surplus by the disbandment of their organizations shall be placed in the National Guard Reserve. Officers may, upon their own application, be placed in the said reserve."

The purpose of the Officers' Reserve Corps is stated to be to secure "a reserve of officers available for service as temporary officers in the Regular Army, * * * as officers of the Quartermaster Corps and other staff corps and depots, and as officers of volunteers." The President was authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for an Officers' Reserve Corps of the Regular Army. These are embodied in General Orders No. 32, War Department, 1916. Among other things these regulations prescribe—"No applicant will be examined who is an officer of the Regular Army on the active list or of the National Guard or who is not a citizen of the United States."

The regulations prescribed by the President were intended to carry out what was considered the intent of the law, namely, that National Guard officers were not eligible under its provisions for commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps.

The enactment into law of the proviso above quoted would probably result in a large number of colonels and lieutenant colonels who have had National Guard service receiving commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps. This would result disastrously both to said corps and to the National Guard Reserve.

In addition to the above objections it may be noted that the highest rank provided for the Officers' Reserve Corps in the act of June 3, 1916, is major, except of those officers who were listed as colonels or lieutenant colonels under the provisions of section 23 of the act of January 21, 1903. The number of these transferred to the Officers' Reserve Corps is as follows: Three colonels, Infantry; I colonel, adjuant general; 2; lieutenant colonels, Infantry; I colonel, adjuant general; 2; lieutenant colonels, Infantry; I colonel, adjuant general; 2; lieutenant colonels, Infantry; Undoubtedly Congress considered this

14. The proviso on page 72, lines 1 to 11, which provides that "not more than one-half of all of the officers detailed in said corps (General Staff) shall at any time be stationed or assigned to or employed upon any duty in or near the District of Columbia," etc., amends section 5 of the act of June 3, 1916, so as to authorize the President to suspend the operation of the same in the event of actual or threatened war or similar emergency in which the public safety demands it. This amendment is considered satisfactory in so far as it goes, but to limit its operation to the event of actual or threatened war or similar emergency in which the public safety demands it is very inadvisable. The evil effects of the restrictions on the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army, to use the personnel of the General Staff for the best interests of the country is very apparent at the present time. Due to a shortage of General Staff officers it has been impossible to carry on a'l necessary General Staff officers on duty in Washington by ordering others there when the emergency has arisen. A great deal of detailed work is normally required that must be done in anticipation of emergencies. Under present conditions it is not possible to meet the requirements. It is very desirable that all restrictions on the authority of the President as to the use of the commissioned personnel of the Army be removed.

15. The provise on page 70, lines 23 to 25, and page 71, lines 1 to 9, amends section 15 of the national-defense act by omitting from it the following:

"Provided, That in the appointment of chaplains in the Regular of the President as to the use of the commissioned personnel of the Army be removed.

15. The proviso on page 70, lines 23 to 25, and page 71, lines 1 to 9, amends section 15 of the national-defense act by omitting from it the following:

"Provided, That in the appointment of chaplains in the Regular Army preference and priority shall be given to applicant veterans, if otherwise duly qualified and shall not have passed the age of 41 years at the time of application, who have rendered honorable war service in the Army of the United States or who have been honorably discharged from such Army."

Section 12, act of February 2, 1901, provides that—

"No person shall be appointed a chaplain in the Regular Army who shall have passed the age of 40 years, nor until he shall have established his fitness as required by existing law."

The purpose of the proviso in the defense act is apparent. Since opportunity has been given for the appointment of chaplains under it there seems no serious objection to the amendment as proposed.

16. Of the remaining legislation the following deserves serious consideration. Under "Pay of the Army," pages 9 and 10 of the bill, is the following proviso:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any officer of the line of the Army who shall be appointed or promoted in violation of any of the terms next hereinafter specified: That of the whole number of officers of Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, Infantry, and of engineers serving with the enlisted force of the Corps of Engineers necessary to fill vacancies created or caused in said arms of the service by reason of the second increment, authorized by said arms by act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, not more than one-fourth shall be appointed or promoted until, exclusive of enlisted men belonging to said arms on June 30, 1916, at least one-fourth of the second increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted, and not more than three-fourths of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promot under the terms of this proviso if enacted into law will be to increase the authorized commissioned personnel in proportion to the increase in the enlisted personnel.

The first increment will be practically complete at the close of the current fiscal year, a marked improvement when compared with the vacancies at the close of the last fiscal year, when there were nearly 26,000 vacancies in the enlisted strength. If the proposed proviso is enacted into law but one-fourth of the officers provided for the line as the second increment by the national-defense act can be appointed at the beginning of the year. The second fourth would probably be available about September 30, 1917, and the third fourth about December 31, 1917, and the last quarter about March 31, 1918.

Assuming that 25 per cent of the commissioned second increment under the provisions of the bill will be added July 1, 1917, and 25 per cent each quarter thereafter, the difference in pay due to this method of promotion and that contemplated in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, would amount to $240,462. This difference is not considered sufficiently important of itself to warrant departure from the provisions of the original act of June 3, 1916. The terms of the defense act are definite and permit plans for organization and equipment of the increment to be made up in advance. The amendment proposed would greatly inspite of the fact that adverse conditions existed along our southern border. It was found that a serious shortage existed in the number of young officers necessary should be enactment of the proposed amendment.

The necessity of trained officers in any efficient military force has been accentuated by the developments of the present European war. Applications for commissions should be encouraged, and the large number of young officers necessary should be adversely affected. The organization of the amendment, therefore, would be largely confined to a retardation of the amendment. The organization of the promotion of the Regular officers of last year.

17. Attention is called to the fact that certain remedial legislation considered necessary to supplant the defense act of June 3, 1916, has not been included in H. R. 20783.

18. It is recommended that appropriation be made for the Military Establishment under the various headings of H. R. 20783, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, to the amount of the original estimate: except in the case of the Office of the Chief Signal Officer. The amount appropriated in the bill, namely, $9,000,000, is considered sufficient, since a large part of the original estimate, $4,800,000, was provided for in the fortifications bill.

At the request of the Chief Signal Officer that the proviso, page 8, lines 13 to 17, be changed by substituting for $1,000,000, $4,500,000. Unless this is done the development of the Aviation Section will be seriously interfered with.

(b) That the following provisos be stricken from the bill:
That on page 9, lines 24 and 25, and page 10, lines 1 to 23.
That on page 72, lines 18 to 25, and page 73, lines 1 to 14.
That there be substituted for the proviso, page 72, lines 1 to 11, the following:

That there be substituted for the proviso, page 72, lines 1 to 11, the following:

"Provided further, That the provisions of section 5 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, relative to restrictions of the employment of General Staff officers in and in the vicinity of the District of Columbia and the assignment of officers to duty in the Office of the Chief of Staff are hereby repealed."

That in case it is impossible to secure the omission of the proviso, page 9, lines 24 and 25, and page 10, lines 1 to 23, it should be amended to read as follows:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any officer of the line of the Army who shall be appointed or promoted in violation of any of the terms next hereinafter specified; that of the whole number of such officers necessary to fill vacancies created or caused by reason of the second increment and authorized by the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, not more than one-fourth shall be appointed or promoted until, exclusive of enlisted men belonging to the line on June 30, 1916, at least one-fourth of the said increment of enlisted men authorized for the line by said act shall have been enlisted; not more than one-half of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least one-half of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted; and not more than three-fourths of said increment shall be made in each grade of each branch in the manner prescribed by existing law for the entire increment, and all officers promoted in accordance with the terms of this proviso shall take rank respectively from the dates on which their promotion shall have become lawful under the terms hereof."

The purpose of this amendment is to prevent promotion in each arm under the enactment from being dependent on enlistments for that arm. Difficulties would attend the execution of the law as now given in H. R. 207

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War. CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS, House of Representatives.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how many antiaircraft guns we have?

Mr. DENT. The Army has none. This is the first time an appropriation for this purpose has been made in an Army appropriation bill.

Mr. FARR. Well, have we anything approaching that in-strument of defense that would protect us in case a machine hovered above the Capitol to-night or to-morrow and dropped explosives on us?

Mr. DENT. Nothing I know of, I will say to the gentleman. Mr. CALDWELL. The only thing we have are the small rapid-fire guns that can be used somewhat for that purpose.

Mr. FARR. What is the range?
Mr. CALDWELL. But it is not of sufficient power, nor is it designed, to take care of the ordinary—

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman means the Bennet-Mercier? Mr. CALDWELL. No; the Lewis gun, of which we have

Mr. FARR. I wanted to ask seriously at this time, in case we should have trouble within a year, would we have any antiaircraft guns ready and how long would it take to construct them?

Mr. DENT. I told the gentleman a moment ago this is the first time this bill carries appropriation for the antiaircraft guns, and this is the first time that any suggestion has been made to the committee that we should have them.

Mr. FARR. Notwithstanding they have had three years' experience across the ocean?

Mr. DENT. I do not know about the "notwithstanding," but it is a fact this is the first time it has been made.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FARR. I will.
Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman there probably would have been no suggestion made to the committee this year if the committee itself had not brought out the fact that we had none when some of these matters were up before the com-

Mr. DENT. And I may add that was brought out by the gentleman from California, and it was upon his suggestion this was put in.

Mr. FARR. Are there any statements as to how long it will take to manufacture these guns?

Mr. KAHN. I do not recall that there are.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that was gone into very carefully before his committee, and now he has the information, why not give it to us?

Mr. FARR. I have not, as to the length of time, I will be frank to say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. It was stated when the naval bill was up under consideration.

Mr. FARR. We have antiaircraft guns now mounted on some of our ships and have appropriated $629,000 in this session's naval bill for antiaircraft guns for all ships already in commission. As new ships are authorized antiaircraft guns will be provided under armor and armament appropriations. Additionally the pending naval measure appropriates $3,800,000 to provide antiaircraft guns and ammunition at naval stations and maga-This discussion shows that while substantial progress has been made in the Navy to supply this important weapon for protection against enemy aircraft, nothing has been thus far done in the Army, except what is provided in the measure now under consideration, to protect us against aerial attacks. That is the reason I wanted to know how long a time is required to make these guns.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will permit me, Gen. Crozier stated to our committee that he had not as yet developed a single antiaircraft gun.

Mr. FARR. And no suggestion as to how long it will take to make one?

Mr. KAHN. None whatever.

FARR. In case trouble should arise a very serious question would arise there?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to the criticisms of the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have been an advocate of the increase of the amount of rifles and rifle ammunition, because I think that is the most important arm with which soldiers fight, and therefore I have advocated liberal appropriations in this respect. The bill reported by this committee a year ago carried $10,000,000 for this particular item. Now, I questioned the Chief of Ordnance as to what disposition he had made of that money, and the record shows that he admitted that he had manufactured about 27,000,000 rounds only in the arsenals; that the amount they had contracted for from private parties was, to be accurate, $2,810,-000 in the purchase of ammunition. In other words, about $6,000,000 of that money had been used, and he told us they contemplated securing something like 200,000,000 more rounds of ammunition out of that money. Now, we grant $12,000,000

Mr. MANN. Is that the current appropriation to which the gentleman is referring?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am referring to the money of a year ago.

Mr. MANN. The money we appropriated a year ago?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That does not run out until the 30th of June. Why should they use

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am explaining why we did not grant any more money for this purpose in this bill.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman has stated that only $2,800,-000 had been used up to a month ago, in about seven months of the year, and that there is only $6,000,000 left to be used in the last five months, and that shows that they did not need the If they spent $2,800,000 in seven months and only had $6,000,000 to spend in the remaining five months, would it not show they needed more money?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit, and I can have his attention, the answer is that Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, could not give the committee any assurance that they could use any more money than we have furnished them for manufacturing ammunition. In other words, either in manufacture or in purchase, they could not satisfy the committee that they could find a place to use this money, and we granted him all the money that we thought he would use for

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman modified this provision which he has carried in every bill, providing for the purchase of more than a certain amount, it would relieve the situation a good deal, would it not?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The testimony of the Chief of Ordnance on that was that he could not purchase this ammunition at anything like a price at present that he thought was an economical or fair price to pay; that where the ammunition before cost about $27 he is being asked to pay $40 or more a thousand for this ammunition, and only one company has so far taken a large order for that, and that is at Alton, Ill., for 2,887,000 rounds, at $45.45.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is familiar with the provisions of the fortification bill relative to the purchase of powder and ammunition. They fix a maximum price for powder, and also they had a provision in the bill that if the private dealer wishes to charge more than 25 per cent in excess of Government manufacture the appropriation is not available. Has the gentleman given any thought of substituting those limitations which exist in the fortification bill for the limitations as they have been carrying them for a number of years past in the Army bill?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say to the gentleman in general that I think it has been the policy of the Ordnance Department, since I have had any information about it, to purchase ordnance supplies on the outside at a higher price than they could manufacture it at the arsenals, and therefore I have advocated that we should operate our arsenals at greater capacity rather than to buy it on the outside.

Mr. GARDNER. I will say to the gentleman that I have discussed this matter a good deal with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Sherley], who has given it a great deal of thought and study, and has come to somewhat different conclusions from the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Hay, and I think his predecessor, for that matter. I think the gentleman from Iowa, John A. T. Hull, was also of the opinion-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered—
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to interrogate the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner], or anybody else who will answer. Now, Congress appropriated a large amount of money for this very purpose in the last bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the reason they do not go on and make this ammunition when they have the money?

Mr. GARDNER. Of course, there is a qualification only allowing a certain amount of these various provisions for ammunition and artillery to be purchased. In other words, it is required to make a certain amount in Government factories. I can not tell the gentleman, but I have no doubt any member of the committee can tell him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But year after year we have been appropriating large sums of money, and in the last two years larger sums than ever appropriated by any nation in time of peace, and yet every time we have these bills up there is complaint that we have not the guns or the ammunition, and that we have not anything. Now, what goes with the money, and why do they not go on and do what Congress tells them to do?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark] that the last appropriation bill was not passed until the 29th of August, 1916, two months after the fiscal year began. hearings were held before the committee in December, three months thereafter. So that the committee does not know how much the Ordnance Department will be able to use this year. Gen. Crozier says he is operating his arsenals to the full extent at the present time. He could run them in two or three shifts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does he not do it? Mr. KAHN. He is not able to do so because he says it is difficult to get the right workmen. He says he has had a great deal of difficulty in getting workmen. Personally, I feel that he is desirous of buying a great deal of this ammunition from private manufacturers. I think that it is good policy to buy some of it from private manufacturers

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman does not think it is good policy to buy the major part of it, if we can make it ourselves?

Mr. KAHN. Well, I do not think it is good policy to buy the major part of it, but there is not a country in the world that makes all of its own ammunition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but the cry goes up all the time that we have got no money; that we have got no ammunition; that we have no guns; and we have got nothing; and the newspapers hammer Congress when it is not the fault of

Mr. KAHN. It is not the fault of Congress. We are liberal with our appropriations, and the fault lies in the departments.

Mr. GARDNER. If I recollect rightly, altogether we appropriated in both committees last year something like $35,000,000 for field artillery and field-artillery ammunition. It may have been $45,000,000; but I think it was $35,000,000. At that time was only one-tenth of the original estimate of the Treat Board. I complained bitterly at the time that 10 years was entirely too long to postpone our safety. It was the fault of Congress. It is true that the money was spent, but Gen. Crozier goes ahead with a very limited degree of rapidity. I do not wish to criticize him. We disagree on most of these questions. But on the 1st of July next we will not have, in my opinion, over 1,100,000 rounds of field-artillery ammunition after we have spent every cent that Congress has appropriated up to the present time

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but $5,000,000 of this last appropriation is left, is it not?

Mr. GARDNER. Very likely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then, why do they not get that $5,000,000 worth of ammunition if they need ammunition?

Mr. GARDNER. They probably will by June 30 have a very large part of it expended; but if they spend every cent that was appropriated for them, even then we will have got only as much ammunition as Great Britain expended in a single day on the Somme front.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I am complaining about is that after we have appropriated the money we have the very same thing to go over again; we have got nothing.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say that the appropriation a year ago carried $10,000,000, with an authorization for spending $5,000,000 of it in the purchase of ammunition from private parties. Now, we have not expended that $5,000,000, nor have we manufactured anything like the amount we ought to have manufactured under the law at the arsenals. The reason we are not recommending here in this appropriation, I say, as much as the War Department asked of us is because they have not been able to show that they could in any way furnish or be prepared to furnish $12,000,000 worth of small arms' ammunition. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the reason why we can not get ammunition made in the United States as easily as Great Britain gets it made here?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The only reason that I can give as an answer to that question is that the Ordnance Department does not use the full capacity of our arsenals to manufacture ammunition as it should have done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is exactly it. Now, I will ask another question. Does Gen. Crozier think he can not get competent men to run three shifts of men at Rock Island and these other arsenals?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understand he contends it is not practicable to do that and get the best results.

Mr. CALDWELL. Gen. Crozier was examined very carefully respecting the three-shifts proposition, and he said it would increase the unit of cost if he put on three shifts over the unit of cost required with two shifts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For what reason?

Mr. CALDWELL. He said he would have to double his supervisory force and increase his overhead charges.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, he has not even kept the two shifts He is opposed to our system. He thinks a certain amount of ammunition ought to be manufactured, and he opposes these limitations that we have put on him, saying how it shall be manufactured. The Government manufactures from 20 to 25 per cent cheaper than they can possibly do under the best circumstances

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When I was a boy, one of the sports we had in the woods was to catch these dry-land terrapins. They would draw in their heads and would not move until we put a fire on their backs. Now, I am in favor of putting a fire on the backs of these Government officials and make them do what we give them money to do. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that we have not given them the money they needed? That is the

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why have they not done what they could with the money that we did give them?

Mr. McKELLAR. They hold it.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman

Mr. MANN.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom? Mr. MANN. I do not think it is a very difficult thing to understand what the Speaker was seeking information about. In the first place, if you buy any ammunition at this time you have to pay a much higher price for it than it would cost the Government to manufacture it in its own arsenals, and if we buy any-I suppose we have bought some-I have been waiting to hear, and I know I will hear if I stay here very long as a Member of Congress, severe criticism, condemnation, accusation of crookedness against some Army officers because they have paid for ammunition manufactured by an outsider more than it would cost to manufacture an equal quantity of ammunition in an arsenal. Army officers are just as thin skinned as Members of Congress are, outside of a few of us, and the rest of the Members of Congress are exceedingly thin skinned when it comes to any kind of charges against them.

I have heard these charges made against all of the officials of the Government who did anything of this sort many times, and I have heard them made against Gen. Crozier on many occasions in this House, or similar charges. wondered at that he hesitates to expend even the limited amount we permit him to spend in the purchase of ammunition in time of peace, when he will have to pay 25 per cent, or even a greater per cent, more for it than an equal amount of ammunition costs when manufactured in the Government arsenals.

Now, the Speaker asks, Why don't they run more shifts? Well, they can not get the men. Why can they not get the men? Because the Government will not pay the same amount for good men that the private manufacturers do who are making ammunition for England and Russia.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlemen yield?
Mr. MANN. No; I do not yield yet. That is a fact. Everybody knows it is a fact.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Chief of Ordnance said it was not the fact.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether he said it or not. If he did, he made a mistake. I doubt whether he said it in that way, but I do not doubt the gentleman's statement. We all know-those of us who know anything about the business going on in the country-that men have been taken out of many factories throughout the country where they do not make ammunition and induced by much higher wages to go into manufacturing establishments where they do make ammunition on foreign contracts. I have had that matter stated to me scores of times by men who bitterly complained that their men were taken away from their factories by inducements to go at higher wages into other factories. We do not pay the wages. I do not say we should pay the wages. I do not undertake to determine that thing. I am sure that if we get out of what we consider peace we will be willing to pay any sum to get these men; but as long as we think we are at peace, and as long as a large share of this House believe we ought to make no provision for the possibility of war, they will be very much afraid to pay much higher wages, either in the Army or Navy, than they do now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes. I do not think I will use all of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The whole thing seems to me this I do not believe the gentleman from Illinois is correct when he says that the House has not any disposition to prepare. I think they have demonstrated over and over again that they have.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the Speaker's pardon. I did not say

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What was it you did say?

Mr. MANN. I said a large portion of the House did not be-lieve we ought to prepare, and the record of the votes will show

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not believe the later votes do show that. I am this way about it: If we need this ammunition we need it when we need it and not some two or three months afterwards. According to the newspapers-I do not know whether there is any truth in it or not-we need it now, and if we need it now we need it like the fellow down in Mississippi wanted a pistol, like the very Old Harry. I am perfectly willing to undertake to defend Gen. Crozier, at least during the next Congress if he will go to work and get men enough to make three shifts in these arsenals, even if it does cost a little more than it would to run two shifts or one shift, because we have appropriated vast sums of money here and from the talk of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and some of these other men, it seems that we are just about as much unprepared now as we were 12 months or 2 years ago, and I can not understand it to save my life.

Mr. QUIN. The trouble is that the Ordnance Department will not manufacture them. We put up the money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri Why will they not do it? Mr. QUIN. They know there is no danger of war, and they

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is none of their business whether there is any danger of a war or not. If we appropriate the money to have a thing done, then the thing ought to be done.

Mr. KAHN. I would like to read what Gen. Crozier said about the three-shift proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. KAHN. I read from page 867 of the hearings:

MIT. KAHN. I read from page 807 of the hearings:

Gen. Crozera. It is very difficult to run a manufacturing establishment efficiently 24 hours a day. The quality of the labor and the quality of the superintendence, particularly, falls off very badly when we pass from two shifts to three shifts. We can run fairly efficiently at two shifts, but it would require a sudden increase of skilled superintendence and an amount of it which would be uneconomical to put in the third shift. The third shift would require us to work at hours of the day when no-body likes to work and when it is practically impossible to get men to turn out a good night's work—because that is what it would be—because they will not conserve their energy for the purpose. It is so out of accord with the ordinary habits of society that you can not get good efforts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I would change the habits of society, then. I think a good deal of Gen. Crozier. I think he is a very efficient officer. But the largest cement plant in the world is in my district. They run three shifts there all the

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do not employ the same kind of labor that an ammunition plant does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not say that the men who work in a cement plant are exactly the same kind of men that work in a munitions factory. This thing about staying up the last end of the night is all a matter of habit.

Mr. KAHN. If the Speaker will allow me-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. There is a certain amount of danger in an ammunition factory. The greatest amount of care has to be exercised by everybody, or you are apt to have an explosion and blow the whole thing into kingdom come.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A large percentage of the American people stay up and work the last end of the night-railroad men, printers, and people like that. Why can not these munition factory men learn to stay up the last eight hours of the night instead of the first eight hours, or the middle eight hours of the

Mr. KAHN. That is a much more precarious employment than those that the speaker mentions.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I suggest to the Speaker one reason given by Gen. -Crozier why there has not been so much progress made? He calls attention to the fact that the bill making the appropriations did not become a law until about the 1st of September. They have had only a very few months in which to make any showing of manufacture since the last appropriations were made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It looks to me like we are in a hole and can not get out of it.

Mr. FIELDS. Gen. Crozier had had only three months when the hearings were held.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that Mr. FITZGERALD. Gen. Crozier can justly be criticized under existing conditions. Anyone who is familiar with his views knows that he has always frankly expressed the opinion that we should encourage private manufacturers in time of peace in order that there may be a very large reserve capacity in time of war. Recognizing the sentiment that exists in Congress in favor of Government manufacture he recommended this year and the sundry civil appropriation bill carries an item of almost $3,000,000 to establish a new plant for field artillery ammunition at the Rock Island arsenal. Some of the work in connection with ammunition is such that it requires very high skill and very great accuracy. A thousandth part of an inch will make a shell unusable. If it is too large, it will not fit the chamber A thousandth part of an inch will make of the gun. In working men in such plants more than two shifts it is necessary to duplicate the supervisory force. supervisory force can not work more than the time required for two shifts.

In order to work three shifts the supervisory board must be duplicated, because they must be there all of the time. There were not in the United States enough skilled men to do the work suddenly thrown on the various plants of the country. eign Governments have placed very large orders for munitions at various times. Plants that have never manufactured munitions were converted into munition plants. The Stevens-Duryea Co., for instance, stopped manufacturing automobiles and took up the manufacture of arms. And so there was an extraordinary demand for skilled men, for competent men. The extent to which the private plants have gone to obtain competent men is extraordinary. I have been told that an officer of the Ordnance Department was paid $100,000 in cash and given a 6 per cent interest in the profits on contracts amounting to $15,000,000, and in addition to a large annual compensation, in order that his services might be secured for a private establishment.

The reason that the inducement was so large was that he had a certain vested right to a permanent position with a retirement in the future. The Ordnance Department is the only place a skilled man competent to conduct such an establishment could be found. A great many ordnance officers have had offers of this character.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How is it that a man in the Ordnance Department of the United States can take a position of that kind? The gentleman means a retired officer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; he resigned from the Army.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Resigned and went into this private establishment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The Army bill became a law some time in September. It became necessary to advertise and get Efforts were made to ascertain whether some plants could undertake these contracts, and be converted into munition plants. It has been ascertained that some were willing to do so, but they could not afford to submit bids unless they could get some assurance that they would get the contracts, because they could not abandon one class of work and prepare for another without getting assurance of a sufficiently large contract to justify such action.

The talk about the country being unprepared is very greatly exaggerated. The Treat Board report calls for an amount of ammunition to cost $450,000,000 and is based on the theory that ammunition to cost $450,000,000 and is based on the theory that we would have in the field 2,000,000 men. Long before we had occasion for 2,000,000 men in the field, long before we could place 2,000,000 men in the field by the mobilization of the industrial resources of the United States, ammunition will be provided far ahead of our ability to use it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I started out to get some informa-on. I got a little, but not very much. I will ask the gentleman this: What is the reason the United States Government can not buy ammunition from these ammunition factories as well as can the British and the other countries?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They can, but there is no place in the United States where you can go and buy ammunition like you can potatoes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It takes a considerable period of time to turn it out and the capacity of the plants is limited. Many of them are all tied up with contracts; and none of them are equipped to turn out the particular things we need.

Attempts are being made to induce concerns to convert their plants into munition factories. The Army bill and the fortification bill carry appropriations of more than $1,000,000 to enable the Ordnance Department to furnish to plants dies and tools and appliances so that they may, under limited orders, begin to manufacture various kinds of munitions, so that they may train their men, and if necessity arose, their plants may be rapidly converted. The criticisms that have been indulged in as to why we have not accumulated large quantities of ammunition are due to exaggeration. In the first place, we are not nearly as badly off as a great many men would have the country believe as to the provisions that have been made, and we have appropriated all the money that probably can be utilized within the time for which it is available.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I think in a few words I can give the Speaker some light on this question.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 17 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unani-mous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments The gentleman from Alabama asks unanithereto be closed in 17 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York barely touched on a subject that goes to the very vitals of this question of producing arms and ammunition. You will realize question of producing arms and ammunition. You will realize that all of these things must work with the highest degree of that all of these things must work a standard the accuracy. In order to produce work of this character in quantities a considerable number of inspection devices, gauges, jigs, special tools, and other appliances are necessary. These things are made of the finest tool steel, and require the skill of the finest mechanics and a long time to produce them. In order to increase the output every Government factory, or any other factory, must have these special appliances in sufficient numbers. When European belligerents, especially the allies, came to this country seeking rifles and ammunition, the manufacturers of the country took the orders and set to work to prepare themselves to begin to manufacture. What did they find? They found that it took them from a year to two years to prepare the necessary inspection devices and other special appliances. After getting these ready it is possible, you will understand, to turn out work rapidly by what is called the repetitive process for mass production.

Until they get these special tools ready, they can not produce the work. The reason why we can not go to these manufacturers and get arms or ammunition is because they are equipped with the devices for the calibers and sizes of arms and ammunition used by the foreign belligerents. None of their arms or ammunition is interchangeable with our own. Therefore it is unfortunately true that manufacturers who are producing large quantities for foreign belligerents could not turn out a single rifle or shrapnel shell for us. Before beginning they would have to go through the same painfully slow process of procuring these gauges, dies, and other special tools and fixtures that are absolutely necessary to produce these things by the repetitive process. This accomplished, they can produce the goods just as the Ingersoll watch or anything else that is made in mass quantities and assembled afterwards is produced. I assure the Speaker that what I have explained to him is largely responsible for the difficulty concerning which he inquires.

A year ago in the national defense act I secured the adoption of an amendment which authorized our Ordnance Department to procure for us the appliances necessary for the manufacture of such war materials as we must use in large quantities. We appropriated in the fortifications bill $1,000,000 to start procuring these appliances for the manufacture of artillery ammunition, and $450,000 in the Army appropriation bill to secure them for the rifle and rifle ammunition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not a 16-inch gun and a 14-inch gun, or any other inch gun use the same size shell, whether it is used in Europe or America?

Mr. TILSON. It does not. It is probably not exactly a It may be in the metric system, for example, and we call it a 16-inch gun for convenience. None of our ammunition for small arms or artillery is interchangeable, and none of our rifles are interchangeable with the ammunition and rifles of any other nation. To-day, if Germany cap-tures French rifles she can not use them with German ammunition. I have heard it suggested that Germany was forehanded enough to start a special manufactory to manufacture French cartridges, so that in case they captured the machine guns of France they might manufacture French ammunition for them. As a rule, however, the arms and ammunition of the different nations are not interchangeable, and in order to change from the manufacture of one to that of the other it requires a long time.

A board consisting of Army officers and two civilians, recently appointed by the President to investigate these things, found that it would take 18 months to convert the factories that are to-day manufacturing rifles for foreign belligerents into factories capable of producing in large quantities our rifle. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One more question and then I am

Mr. TILSON. I shall be glad to answer any number of questions the Speaker may ask.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the Ordnance Department of the United States taken any steps toward getting these dies, jigs, and the rest of these things?

Mr. TILSON. They are beginning, but they are having the very difficulties that I spoke of when I first introduced this proposition. Unfortunately the difficulties would be far greater and our situation would be worse in case of war. They are finding great difficulty in the first place in finding the necessary highly skilled workmen. These men have been tied up by contracts for foreign work. Even Canada came over here and made contracts for the output of every gauge maker in the country that she could get hold of to make gauges for time fuses and shells to be made for that country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.
Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the gentleman if he is not mistaken about that? Upon examination of the officers of the Ordnance Department, I do not remember which one, it was admitted that they had not done one thing, or virtually nothing, rifles, and those rifles can be made at $16 apiece. Now, Gen.

with the $200,000 that we appropriated for these jigs, dies, and so forth, last year.

Mr. CALDWELL. He said that they had started in a small

Mr. McKELLAR. Those are the very words that he used. He could not show anything they had done yet.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What became of the $200,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. We do not know.

Mr. TILSON. They have it yet, and they say they are making progress, designs are being drawn, studies are being made, and so forth; but it is my aim to keep urging that these things shall be procured and owned by the Government. If we had an ample supply of them we could then in case of war immediately go to private manufacturers and within a few days start them to manufacturing our arms and ammunition in large quantities.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes in order that I may ask him a question. The CHAIRMAN. The time has already been fixed by unani-

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois regarding the cost of workmen in the arsenals, I will say that it is a matter of testimony by Gen. Crozier himself, on page 871, in response to questions by myself and others, that the wages in the arsenals have been increased at least 20 per cent because of the increase of wages to men in the same line of employment upon the outside.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I can not yield because I have only five minutes. In response to questions on the part of the committee whether or not he thought he could get these workmen, if we increased the wages, he answered that he believed because of the other advantages the Government grants and the wage advance, there was nothing to be gained by increasing the wages, and I will say further that not a single instance has been brought to the attention of the board or attention of this committee where a single man has left the employment of the United States in any of these arsenals. I refer to these skilled workmen. There are plenty of these high-salaried officers who have been educated at the expense of the Government who have resigned and deserted their country when it needed them, and they have gone out to work for these men at high wages, but there is no record that any of the men employed on daily wages have gone out on account of higher wages on the outside.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; I can not.

They are leaving the navy yards in droves. Mr. MAHER. Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As far as the rifle is concerned, the gentleman from New York said that we were very well prepared, as far as that matter goes.

I will say it is a matter of record that we have about 700,000 rifles. Now, when the war started in Europe we heard a great deal about the preparation of the Germans. Gen. Crozier is on record before our committee as saying that we were reliably record before our commutee as saying that we were reliably informed that there were 2½ rifles in reserve in Germany for each soldier, or that, with 8,000,000 soldiers, they had about 20,000,000 rifles on hand. England had plenty of men, but she had no rifles. It is a matter now of general knowledge that Russia had plenty of men-more men than any other nation on earth-but no rifles, and there was only one nation who was able to put up a fight with Germany, and that was France. You talk about arms and armament over in Europe. Now, there are 1,600 miles of lines of battle, and on each side the men are in the ground. They have dug a trench and have gotten out of sight. Those men have rifles in their hands, and the only reason that the war can not be finished is because they can not drive those men out of the ditches with these rifles in their hands. You talk about your big cannon and your engines of war. If to-morrow you could take away from one side all the cannon, all their aeroplanes, all their engines of war, and give to one side the rifles only, the men with the rifles in their hands would win the battle in a single day. The only way men can be driven from their positions is by other men with rifles in their hands. Of these rifles we have on hand 700,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman— Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I can not yield. We have the best rifle in the world in America; Col. Tilson admits that. That rifle is the most effective weapon for men to fight with. Here in three years, with this danger around us, according to the testimony of Gen. Crozier himself, we have manufactured 66,000

Crozier tells us that they have gone up a hundred per cent if we buy them outside. Instead of trying to make those rifles we have been making ammunition.

I want to charge right here and now if it is a fact we have been very derelict in our duty of preparing for the possibility of war as far as the general manufacture of arms and ammunition is concerned, I want to bring further testimony. It is admitted by the Ordnance Department and Gen. Crozier himself that they intend to expend in three years $50,000,000 for machine guns, just half the money we expended in support of the Army in 1916, and you will find from the testimony he does not propose to manufacture a single gun. You voted money last year and the year before for these machine guns, and when I asked him before the committee why they were not making the machine guns he said that he would tell them in confidence why they did not make them. I asked him whether it was because he expected to buy those machine guns, and he made no answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. SHALLENBERGER. May I have my time extended five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the committee and has been allotted.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to say something in regard to the matter of these machine guns.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I thought the time had all been provided for, but the gentleman could ask unanimous consent to extend the

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the time five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time be extended from 17 to 22 minutes, the gentleman from Nebraska to be recognized for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman

a question,
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will yield for one question.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman made the statement if we would get rid of the artillery and fight with the rifle—

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I said if one side had only artillery and the other side had only rifles, the men with the rifles would drive the men with the artillery from the field.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that in Europe, before any attack with the rifle is made, the artillery has to do deadly execution?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and the only reason the artillery can stay upon the field is because supporting infantrymen with rifles in their hands hold the trenches in advance of the artillery and prevent the attack of the artillery by opposing infantry. In other words, the artillery is, after all, primarily an assistant to the riflemen in the trenches.

Mr. MAHER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MAHER. The question I want to ask is this: The gentleman stated that skilled mechanics were not leaving the

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We had no testimony before our committee that they were, nor was that offered to us as a reason for not operating the arsenals.

Mr. MAHER. That is not the fact in connection with the navy yards, because in my congressional district, when I went down there last Tuesday morning to find out what the conditions were relating to skilled mechanics, they told me private em-ployers were bidding for them and offering more wages and they can not hold them, and the list of the skilled mechanics at the New York Navy Yard has been exhausted in the last year

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That only confirms me in my opinion that the War Department has not tried to operate these arsenals to capacity. The committee asked representatives of the Ordnance Department whether or not increase in wages would be a help to get these men. I want to say about working two or three shifts, that if we can save 100 per cent as compared with what we pay now, then the Government can well afford to pay the wages of the men to run the arsenals two or three shifts, as the Speaker has indicated.

Now about these machine guns, for which it is proposed to expend $50,000,000. We were first told they were to cost $3,000 apiece; that price was later reduced to $2,700 apiece. The rifle is to cost $750. The cost of the tripod gun mount is about $250. The accessories enumerated run the price up to $2,700. It is like one of these picture agents that goes about the country.

He sells you the frame and gives you the picture. You buy the gun for $750, but the accessories cost $2,000 per gun. Part of the accessories that go with these guns consist of packsaddles that go upon the mules. They propose to buy over 85,000 packsaddles at $150 apiece. Five mules to the gun, or for 17,000 guns 85,000 mules, for which 85,000 packsaddles are to be purposed. chased. These five packsaddles for each gun cost $750 or $150 per pack. I guarantee to say that no human being in America ever saw a pile of 85,000 packsaddles at one time. But that is only a sample of the way the money of the people is to be expended. All of this apparatus, together with accessories, is proposed to be bought, together with these machine guns.

Mr. QUIN. Tell us about the tripods.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Colt people make the tripods just as good as the one that goes with this gun you buy, and they throw it in. They have contracted to pay $250,000 for 5,000 they throw it in. They have contracted to pay $220,000 for 5,000 of them. And so it goes through all the whole proposition of spending the people's money.

Now, I want to say something about equipping an army. If this Nation of ours had 5,000,000 rifles—and 5,000,000 Springfield rifles at $16 each would cost $80,000,000—5,000,000 American men could hold this country against any other country on earth. The United States makes the best rifles in the world, we have got the bravest and best men in the world to use those have got the bravest and best men in the world to use those rifles, and if we arm them as they should be armed with our service rifle, we will have the best Army in the world.

Mr. FARR. How many could you arm now?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. About 700,000.

Mr. FARR. The gentleman does not mean to say 700,000 rifles would be enough for 700,000 men?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In other words, they would arm about 500,000 men for a few months of warfare.

Mr. FARR. For 2,000,000 men how long would it take to make these rifles?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Two or three years. And I will say further as to why we have not been able to secure this ammunition. It is because there are no manufacturers equipped to make our ammunition for our rifles in large quantities, and they are not equipped to make our rifles. Our arsenals have been equipped and the arms are wanted now. They have been equipped to make these rifles. We spend the money to make them, and I hope they will make them.

Mr. FARR. Suppose we had 2,000,000 men; have we the governmental facilities with which to provide them with rifles and other things?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It would take about two years to make them. Judging by the way we have been making them recently, it would take about 100 years.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman has mentioned an army of 2,000,000 men. The projects are all for an army of 1,000,000 men.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And the General Staff comes up and says it is absolutely inadequate, and they ask 3,000,000.
Mr. GARDNER. The Army of 1,000,000 men requires 3,100,000 rifles?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes, sir.
Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to put in the Record a short excerpt, on page 862 of the hearings, from Gen. Crozier's testimony, which explains this matter we are discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Mc-Kellar] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the matter referred to:

The following is the matter referred to:

Mr. McKellar. What is the condition of our supply of ammunition for small arms? How much have we on hand?

Gen. Crozier. Between 200,000,000 and 300,000,000 rounds of the most important class, which is the rifle ammunition. I can give it to you a little bit more accurately than that.

Mr. McKellar. Are we progressing satisfactorily along that line? I mean, are we in a safe condition so far as having a proper amount of ammunition on hand for our small arms, in your judgment?

Gen. Crozier. We have not as much as we ought to have. Mr. McKellar, but we are not as much behind as we are on other things. The scheme of the estimate which I am placing before you now is that we shall have what is considered to be a proper supply of small-arms ammunition for the force that is provided for in the national-defense act, in three more annual appropriations. This estimate which I have before you now will provide one-third of the amount necessary to give us all the small-arms ammunition which we need for the force contemplated by the national-defense act, leaving the remaining two-thirds to be provided for in two more annual appropriations.

Mr. McKellar, In other words, you think the writh two more annual appropriations.

remaining two-thirds to be provided for in two more annual appropriations.

Mr. McKellar. In other words, you think that with two more appropriations besides this one, of like amount, you will have enough reserve of small-arms ammunition for the Army provided for in the national-defense act?

Gen. Crozier. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKellar. Both for the Regular Army and for the militia?

Gen. Crozier. All of them.

. Mr. Shallenberger. You stated a year ago that you had on hand 250,000,000 rounds?

Gen. Crozier. Yes; and I have added to that in the meantime.

Mr. McKellar. About how much have you added, if you have the

Gen. Crozier. Yes; and I have added to that in the meantime.

Mr. McKellar. About how much have you added, if you have the figures?

Gen. Crozier. There were on hand on the 30th of last June about 227.000,000 rounds of rific ammunition. That means at all places where this ammunition was subect to use by troops of the United States. Some of it was in the hands of troops who are required to keep a certain reserve on hand and some in the arsenals. Now, I expect to manufacture during the fiscal year which we ard in now 280,000,000 rounds more.

Mr. Stallenberger. You said you had 200,000,000 rounds and how did it come about that you only added 27,000,000 rounds during the past year, whereas now you are going to add 230,000,000 rounds?

Gen. Crozier. Because I could not expend that appropriation as soon as it was made. I am engaged in expending it now, and it will be from that expenditure that I expect to get the 230,000,000 rounds I am now talking about as intended to be manufactured during the fiscal year we are now in.

Mr. McKellar. In other words, this year will increase our supply of small-arms ammunition over 100 per cent; is that correct?

Gen. Crozier. That would be the case if during the year we did not have to use any, but I contemplate that we will use and issue and transfer to the Navy—and get the money back for it to make more—etc. about 76,000,000 rounds, so that my estimated amount on hand on the 30th of near American Liew many of the contemplate for the Navy—and get the money back for it to make more—etc. about 76,000,000 rounds, so that my estimated amount on hand on the 30th of near American Liew many men does that supply?

Gen. Crozier. It is something over 2,000,000,000 rounds.

Mr. McKellar. How much are you manufactured uring the current year out of this appropriation some 97,000,000 rounds.

Mr. McKellar. How much are you manufactured uring the current year out of this appropriation some 97,000,000 rounds.

Mr. McKellar. How much do you expect to purchase?

Gen. Crozier. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKell

Gen. Crozier. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. What is the difference?
Mr. OLNEY. Tell us something about the bonus system; whether the taking away of the bonus system from the arsenals has resulted in any increased cost or lessening of efficiency.
Gen. Crozier. The price has gone up very considerably since last increased cost or lessening of efficiency.

Gen. Crozier. The price has gone up very considerably since last year.

Mr. McKellar. The cost of manufacture, too?

Gen. Crozier. The cost of manufacture and the cost of purchase of the ammunition has gone up very considerably. The cost of manufacture has gone up from about $25 per 1,000 rounds to about $36 per 1,000 rounds, which is an increase of nearly 45 per cent. The increase has come very largely in the increased cost of material—lead brass, etc. In regard to the purchase price, that has gone up to the following: I have placed orders for this rifle ammunition with two different private manufacturers during the current fiscal year. One price is $40.33 per 1,000 rounds and another price is $45.75 per 1,000 rounds. I received bids from a third manufacturer and the price was $55 per 1,000 rounds but I did not make any award.

The Chairman. Last year it was $34 per 1,000 rounds?

Gen. Crozier. About that, yes; the last price was in the neighborhood of $34 or $35.

Mr. Caldwell. There has been a considerable saving, then, in our own manufactured product?

Gen. Crozier. Yes, sir.

Mr. Caldwell. Then, why would it not be a good scheme to enlarge our plants?

Gen. Crozier. Because, Mr. Caldwell, I do not think there is any chance of Congress making those plants as large as would be necessary to provide for our war-time needs, and I do not know of any other way of providing for our war-time needs than to give some encouragement to private manufacturers, to keep them in business and in a position to supply us.

Mr. McKellar. Have not the private manufacturers had a great to private manufacturers, to keep them in business and in a position to supply us.

Mr. McKellar. Have not the private manufacturers had a great deal of encouragement during the past few years outside of our own Government?

Gen. Crozier. They have had enormous encouragement; yes.

Mr. McKellar. Do you think it is necessary for our Government to keep on encouraging them under the present circumstances?

Gen. Crozier. Well, Mr. McKellar, the only extent to which it would be necessary for our Government to keep on encouraging them in the present circumstances would be to keep them in the position of having the special things necessary to make our patticular ammunition; but they would not need any very considerable orders. But looking toward the future, and considering what would be necessary to keep them in a position to manufacture any considerable quantities, or, at least, to expand to manufacture any considerable quantities, in ordinary times, I do not see how that is to be done unless the Government does give them some encouragement.

Mr. McKellar. They seem to be manufacturing for these European Governments without difficulty.

Gen. CROZIER. I think that the words "without difficulty," Mr. McKellar, would need a liftle modification: they have had enormous difficulty.

MCKELLAR, would need a little modification: they have had enormous difficulty.

Mr. Caldwell. In the last bill we appropriated a large sum of money for the purchase of jigs, dies, and all those things, and I would like to ask whether you have gone about making any of those purchases?

Gen. Crozler. To a limited extent, Mr. Caldwell.

Mr. Caldwell. Have they used up all of the money that was appropriated?

Gen. Crozuer. To a limited extent, Mr. Caldwell.

Mr. Caldwell. Have they used up all of the money that was appropriated?

Gen. Crozuer. We have used but very little of it.

Mr. McKellar, Why is that? Why not carry out the views of Congress as expressed in this national-defense act in regard to the manufacture of powder and other materials?

Gen. Crozuer, I intend to do so, Mr. McKellar; but in explanation of why we have not made any greater progress—although we have made some progress—up to the present time I will first remind you that the Army bill, which contained a good deal of this enough you that the Army bill, which contained a good deal of this enough you that the Army bill, which contained a good deal of this enough and we have not had much time.

Mr. Kahn. The appropriation bill, you mean?

Gen. Crozuer, Yes, sir. The national-defense act, which contained legislation looking toward the same objects, did not make any appropriation, as you will remember; it simply made an appropriation in order. Now, the appropriation was simply made an appropriation in order. Now, the appropriation was simply made an appropriation in order. Now, the appropriation was simply occupied up to the present time in providing for the judicious expenditure of the appropriations that were made. However, we have not neglected this subject altogether. I have recently given an order, or stated that an order might be expected, for providing certain of these articles, such as gauges, and so on, which will prepare us to get this amount of the appropriation bout five different manufacturers; the particular manufacturers have not been picked on the proper was a five may be. That is under way. However, the expended for that purpose will not come anywhere near using up the funds that have been authorized to be expended for that particular purpose; but I do not intend to stop just at that point. Since we are on that subject, and if you are interested, I will say a word or two with reference to some other manufactures than those we have men

Mr. KAHN. So you have nothing with which to compare what they pay—that is, the foreign Governments—and what we pay?

Gen. CROZIER. No. str; I have not. I will say this, however: That I very much doubt whether any of them are paying $55 per 1.000 pounds, which was the bid of one concern, and which I have already referred to. That was a bid from an establishment which was probably filled up with orders and which did not like to simply refuse to respond, but which did not expect to get at order at any such price as that.

Mr. Kahn. How about the $44 price? Is the company that is turning out ammunition for us at that price getting anything like that from the foreign Governments?

Gen. Crozura. I have not any way of checking precisely, Mr. Kahn, but I should suspect that unless they are manufacturing under orders that were given a year or two ago they are getting something like that price now. As you all know, the cost of material and labor has gone to tramendously.

that were given a year or two ago they are getting something like that price now. As you all know, the cost of material and labor has gone up tremendously.

Mr. McKellar. In other words, for the ammunition that we are buying and laying up as a reserve we are paying factories in this country about the prices that are being paid by foreign Governments using ammunition in the present war? You will notice I say about the same. Gen. Crozier. I have not any precise information on that point.

Mr. McKellar. I understood, in answer to Mr. Kahn's question, that you said you assumed the figures were somewhat about the same. Gen. Crozier. I assume that; yes, sir.

Mr. McKellar. At what capacity are our own factories being run? Are they being run on a one-shift basis regularly, on a two-shift basis, or on more than a two-shift basis.

Gen. Crozier. The orders which are given contemplate their running at full capacity on a two-shift basis.

Mr. Caldwell. That is, I6 hours a day?

Gen. Crozier. Yes, sir.

Mr. Caldwell. Why not run 24 hours a day? That would add one-third more, would it not?

Mr. McKellar. If we are saving a great deal of money here, why would it not be better in these times, when we are having to pay saich an enormous amount for reserve ammunition, to run on ... three-shift basis and make more of our ammunition?

Gen. Crozier. It is very difficult to run a manufacturing establishment efficiently 24 hours a day. The quality of the labor and the quality of the superintendence, particularly, falls off very badly wher we pass from two shifts to three shifts. We can run fairly efficiently at two shifts, but it would require a sudden increase of skilled superintendence and an amount of it which would be uneconomical to put in the third shift. The third shift would require us to work at hours of the day when nobody likes to work and when it is practically impossible to get men to turn out a good night's work—because that is what it would be—because they will not conserve their energy for the purpose. It is so out of accord with the ordinary habits of society that you can not get good efforts.

Mr. McKellar. Under the bill of last year you were authorized to expend through purchase $5,000,000 of this appropriation. Will that amount be spent? In other words, do you contemplate manufacturing only to the extent of $5,000,000 and purchasing with the other $5,000,000, or how do you propose dividing it in these times of big prices?

Mr. LONDON Mr. Chairman I ask unanimous consent to Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, about the time I was first elected to Congress, four years ago, I happened to drop into a committee room here in the Capitol and heard Gen. Crozier testify that he was paying private munitions makers 54 per cent more for caissons for gun carriages than the arsenal cost at the Rock Island Arsenal. It occurred to me that if the price of the private munitions makers was so much greater than the arsenal cost, it would be economy for Uncle Sam to manufacture a larger proportion of his Army and Navy supplies in Government establishments.

I began to inquire into the subject and learned that at the Rock Island Arsenal the capacity could be greatly extended at a comparatively small cost. I found that at that time there were two large stone buildings, originally built for manufacturing purposes at a cost of some $400,000 each, standing practically idle at the Rock Island Arsenal. They were being used merely for storage purposes. The Government owns its own water-power plant in the Mississippi River at Rock Island, and I learned that enough power was going to waste to run the machinery in these two buildings, provided I could get the two buildings equipped with machinery

So when the proper bill was before the House I offered an amendment providing for the equipment of these two buildings with the necessary machinery to manufacture articles being purchased in large quantities from private manufacturers at what I considered were excessive prices.

But it developed the Ordnance Department had sent up officers to testify in committee against my amendment and it was beaten by a close vote.

I also introduced many other bills for the increase of the capacity at the Rock Island Arsenal, and the conviction gradually dawned on me that the Ordnance Department was opposed to Government manufacture, or at least any substantial increase in the Government arsenals. They were in favor of giving the bulk of the contracts to private munitions concerns. refer to the time I started to make a fight for Government manufacture four years ago. The situation is now somewhat improved.

The reasons or excuses given by the Ordnance Department officials four years ago will not stand close investigation.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TAVENNER. I can not yield just now, as my time is

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TAVENNER. The first argument I was confronted with was that these private manufacturers were very patriotic, and we should do everything possible to build them up in time of peace, so that we could rely upon their patriotic cooperation in time of war. They outrageously overcharged the Government in time of war, even more than in time of peace.

The next argument I was confronted with was that foreign Governments would give them some contracts that would keep their machinery going with Government help, and we could ntilize that machinery in time of war. But it turns out that the big shells used by foreign Governments, according to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tilson], are of a different size than those used by our guns.

The last thing they say is that if we give these private munition firms larger contracts we can have the use of their plants in time of war, and that their increased capacity will be a safeguard to the Government-plants on which we may depend in time of emergency. Now, do you know that every one of the plants that gets these contracts is in a territory that the Army War College says is absolutely unsafe? The Army War College practically says that if we should rely upon those plants in time of war the Nation would be in peril, because they are in a territory that is absolutely unsafe. And yet these ordnance officials are telling us that we should rely upon those plants, while at the same time another division of the War Department says they ought to be removed to the interior of the country.

That is the kind of arguments they indulge in. pillar to post, and there is nothing in them in the end. In the meantime three firms in this country have drawn down $200,000,000 worth of contracts from the Army and Navy Departments, and we have paid them from 20 to 50 per cent more for these supplies than we could have manufactured them for in Government plants. [Applause.]

My purpose in asking permission to revise and extend my remarks is to place in the RECORD the principle laid down by the War College in Document No. 532, as follows:

STRATEGIC LOCATION OF MILITARY DEPOTS, ARSENALS, AND MANUFACTURING PLANTS IN THE UNITED STATES.

TURING PLANTS IN THE UNITED STATES.

1. Paragraph 60 of the statement of a proper military policy for the United States, prepared by the War College division, General Staff Corps, in compliance with instructions of the Secretary of War and submitted September 11, 1915, is as follows:

"60. As a general military principle, no supply depot, arsenal, nor manufacturing plant of any considerable size, supported by War Department appropriations for military purposes, should be established or maintained east of the Appalachian Mountains, west of the Cascade or Sierra Nevada Mountains, nor within 200 miles of our Canadian or Mexican borders, and steps should be taken gradually to cause to be moved depots and manufacturing plants already established in violation of this military principle."

I shall not place in the RECORD, for obvious reasons, the locations of the various private munitions plants that the Ordanace Department officers have been counseling Congress to build up year after year by the awarding of contracts at excessive prices, nor will I state the strong language used in describing the existing situation. But I desire to assert that these ordnance offi-cers, in their eagerness to have the fat Government contracts given to private munitions concerns instead of Government arsenals, have grossly neglected the welfare and safety of the Nation. Every one of the 18 plants about which the Army officers have been so solicitous are located in violation of the principle set forth by the Army War College. I am calling attention to this statement because I believe I am serving my country in doing so. Let us quit giving contracts to the private munition firms located in the danger zone and build up our own plants in the interior of the country.

Secretary of the Navy Daniels in his annual report for 1914 called attention to the economy of Government manufacture by saying that, "contrary to popular idea, the Navy Department in what it manufactures does so, from a superdreadnaught to a gallon of paint or a pound of powder, cheaper than the same can be purchased. This is particularly true of the most expensive instruments of war, but it is equally true of gasoline engines, electrical supplies, engines for dreadnaughts, shrapnel, clothing for marines and sailors, accouterments, and a multitude of other articles required for the fleet and shore stations."

Government manufacture will mean that the workmen who perform the labor of actually making the munitions will receive higher wages and better working conditions than if the contracts for war materials are awarded the private munition firms, among which are numbered the most bitter enemies of organized labor in the United States.

Nationalization of the manufacture of war paraphernalia. offers a program on which all save those directly or indirectly interested in private war-trafficking concerns may unite. Whether in favor of disarmament, vastly increased armament, or maintaining the present armament, all can meet on a common ground. Those who desire a greater armament can obtain it through Goverament manufacture without placing increased burdens upon the taxpayers.

If those who demand such a large Army and Navy are wholly sincere, and if their only desire is that we shall have the strongest possible Army and Navy, why should they not want us to obtain the maximum defensive power or the maximum striking power for every dollar we appropriate, instead of only about 65 cents worth of fighting strength for every dollar appropriated?

By manufacturing armor, munitions, submarines, aeroplanes, and so forth, in its own plants the Government will be able to keep for its own use any improvements in such vehicles of war. Under the present policy of giving the major part of military contracts to private concerns it has been impossible to do this. "Even now," says Secretary of the Navy Daniels, "the improvements in armor and the designs worked out by the Navy have been embodied in the warship of another nation recently finished by the Bethlehem Steel Co. and put into commission. This is not an argument lightly to be disregarded in favor of a Government armor plant, nor has it been overlooked, for instance, by Japan, which has erected its own armor-making plant and surrounded it with such secrecy that none of the other nations is able to tell whether or not at this minute the Japanese armor may not be superior to any other in existence."

Under the present system the Government is at the mercy of a few concerns having a monopoly of the manufacture of the materials of war, who appear to have a gentlemen's agreement to divide the Government contracts between themselves and between whom there is no competition worthy of the name. "I do not see how it is possible for Congress to justify to the people a refusal to erect a Government plant," said Secretary Daniels to Congress, "nor how it can answer the charge that will invariably be brought up-that the same mysterious providence which saved this profitable business to the steel companies three times in the past, even after money for a Government plant had actually been appropriated, is not still at work exercising its beneficent protection over these lusty specimens of infant industries, who are even now under Government investigation as violators of the antitrust law."

The present European war has demonstrated that private plants not in the business of manufacturing war materials can make the necessary alterations to manufacture such supplies in a remarkably short space of time. By enlarging the Government plants and operating them in time of peace the Government could have on hand sufficient ammunition, guns, and so forth, to equip the most powerful army ever organized and keep it in the field a long time after private plants not engaged in the manufacture of war materials would have been able to reorganize their shops and be turning out ammunition and other supplies. In the event that private manufacturers should not respond to the necessity of the occasion, the Government could itself take over such industrial plants as it might need, just as England has done.

It is to the interest of only the few to leave profit in war and preparation for war, while it is to the interest of the entire earth's population to take it out.

I wish also to insert in the Record the following from the Rock Island (Ill.) Argus of February 16, 1917, relative to Rock Island Arsenal:

ARSENAL SITE IS GIVEN BOOST BY EASTERNER HERE—H. S. PUTNAM, NEW YORK ENGINEER, MAKES PUBLIC MEMORANDA HE SUBMITTED TO WASHINGTON—TELLS ADVANTAGES OF ISLAND—WILL BE SPEAKER AT MEETING TO-MORROW NIGHT TO LAUNCH CAMPAIGN TO SECURE NI-TRATE FACTORY.

H. S. Putnam, New York hydraulic and electric engineer, to-day made public the memoranda he presented to the War Department in Washington Wednesday, in which the advantages of Rock Island Arsenal for the location of the $20,000,000 nitrate plant were made plain.

Mr. Putnam arrived at the home of his brother, E. K. Putnam, in Davenport, last night. He made public the information he filed with Washington authorities in order to enlighten the business and industrial interests of the three cities as to the importance of the fight for the nitrate plant.

Washington authorities in order to enignten the business and interests of the three cities as to the importance of the fight for the intrate plant.

Mr. Putnam will address the commercial organizations of Rock Island, Davenport, and Moline at the Davenport Commercial Club to-morrow night. There will be a dinner at 6.30, followed by the talk of Mr. Putnam. Appended is the information he gave to Gen. Crozier:

(1) The largest and best-located arsenal in the United States is at Rock Island.

(2) The location is far removed from the north, south, east, and west boundaries of the country.

(3) The Mississippi River, the Hennepin and Illinois Canals furnish water transportation to the Great Lakes and all portions of the Mississippi River Valley and the Gulf States.

(4) Rallroad facilities are unequaled, and direct connection exists over several lines to all points east, west, north, and south.

(5) Rock Island is situated in the midst of the towns of Rock Island, Moline, Davenport, Bettendorf, East Moline, and Silvis—all of them manufacturing centers and with a combined population of over 125,000, and furnishes an excellent skilled and unskilled labor market.

(6) The United States Government contemplates making the Rock Island Arsenal one of the principal, if not the principal, arsenal in the country.

Island Arsenal one of the principal, it not be principal, it not be principal, it not be principal.

(7) An excellent water power exists at Rock Island, capable of being economically developed to 150,000 horsepower.

(8) The development of the water power at Rock Island will solve the problem of navigation on the Mississippi River, now handicapped by the limitations imposed by the Rock Island Rapids.

(9) Rock Island is situated on the edge of the Illinois coal fields, and an abundant supply of coal is found within a radius of from 60 to 100 miles.

(10) The Illinois coal contains from 1.3 to 1.5 per cent nitrogen content, and is a noncoking coal and is entirely suitable for the manufacture of nitrogenous products from the gasification of coal.

(11) The near-by coal fields furnish an excellent location for the construction of a steam plant to insure the absolute continuity, throughout the 24 hours of every day, of the 150,000 horsepower developed on the the 24 hours of every day, of the 150,000 horsepower developed on the Mississippi River.

(12) The water-power plant with its steam auxiliary is the most economical method of producing power. The power is produced at a total estimated cost, includes capital costs, or 0.125 cent per kilowatt hour. This does not include credits for by-products.

(13) The fact that a combination of both water and steam power is used absolutely insures the supply of power at all times, even in case one plant or the other is totally destroyed.

(14) A 200,000-horsepower combined water-power and steam auxiliary plant and a by-product plant can be constructed at an estimated cost of $19,478,000. The combined plant will furnish electric power for the manufacture of nitrates at an estimated net cost to the Government of $2.16 per horsepower year.

(15) As an initial installation, a 100,000-horsepower combined development can be made for an estimated cost of $11,670,000. Such a lant will produce electric power at an estimated net cost of $4.90 per plant will produce electric power at an estimated net cost of $4.90 per horsepower year.

(16) As already stated, the towns of Moline, Rock Island, Davenport, and Bettendorf are manufacturing centers, and any surplus power in excess of the requirements of the United States Government could be readily sold.

(17) By extending the steam plant in the coal fields the amount of power developed can be increased without material increase in cost to four hundred or five hundred thousand kilowatts, or to any amount desired.

(18) Provision must be made at once to take care of the increasing demands for power for the use of the Government at the Rock Island Arsenal. This can best be done in the permanent manner herein contemplated.

AUTHORIZATION OF PLANT.

AUTHORIZATION OF PLANT.

In "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, Congress appropriated $20,000,000 for the purpose of constructing a plant "for the production of nitrates and other products for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products." Under authority of the act, the President, by Executive order dated January 15, 1917, appointed an interdepartmental board, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of making the necessary investigations and submitting recommendations relative to the selection of water-power sites suitable for the purposes prescribed by the statute.

consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of making the necessary investigations and submitting recommendations relative to the selection of water-power sites suitable for the purposes prescribed by the statute.

In accordance with the above act of Congress and the Executive order creating the interdepartmental board, the following reasons for the selection of the site at Rock Island Arsenal for the proposed nitrate plant are submitted:

It is proposed to develop the large amount of water power now available in the Mississippi River at Rock Island and insure the continuous supply of such power by the construction of an auxiliary steam plant at the mines in the coal fields of Illinols. In connection with the destructive gasification of coal, for the recovery of such fixed nitrogen and other by-products as exist in coal, and the production of a fuel gas to be used under the bollers in the auxiliary steam-power plant. The combined plant will recover the fixed nitrogen from the coal before it is used for power purposes in the steam-power plant, will furnish an almost unlimited amount of cheap power for the recovery of nitrogen from the atmosphere by any process which the Government may select. The location at Rock Island is proposed because of its central position, the water power which can be developed, the nearness of a suitable coal supply, the shundant labor available, the unexcelled water and rail transportation in all directions, the safety of the location, and, finally, the fact that the most important arsenal in the country is located on Rock Island.

The Rock Island Arsenal is located on an island in the Mississippl, at the foot of the Rock Island Rapids. The water power at this point is now used by the United States Government, and is but partially developed. It is practicable to develop the water power in the Mississippl, at the foot of the Rock Island Rapids. The water power in the Mississippl River at Rock Island Arsenal is loca to 500,000 kilowatts, should that amount of power be required.

BY-PRODUCT GAS-PRODUCER COAL PLANT.

A by-product gas-producer plant should be constructed in connection with the auxiliary steam-power plant.

Plants of the gas-producer type have been developed and perfected which extract the nitrogen from the coal in the form of ammonium sulphate, a common form of fertilizer, and produce an abundant supply of gas which is available for use under the boilers in the steam-power plant. The market value of the ammonium sulphate produced will much more than balance the entire annual cost of the by-product plant, including interest, depreciation, coal, supplies, maintenance, and operating expenses. The gas produced, therefore, can be regarded as a waste product utilized in the steam-power plant. The power so produced, combined with the hydroelectric power developed on the Mississippi River, utilizing the water power now going to waste, will produce power at a minimum of cost and will represent the highest type of true conservatism, making use, as it does, of our natural resources in the best, most economical, and most efficient manner, and for the most part utilizing the natural resources which are now being wasted. Such by-product coal plants can make use of coals of low grade, and unmarketable coals, and consequently the cost of fuel is reduced to a minimum. At the same time, mining waste will be reduced to a minimum. While a gas-producer plant of special type is referred to above, any other suitable process which accomplishes the purposes suggested can be used. It is believed, however, that the process which secures the maximum amount of fixed nitrogen from the coal and produces the maximum amount of feel gas will best serve the combination of plants here proposed.

The plans propose a high-tension transmission line connecting the hydroelectric plant with the steam auxiliary plant. The transmission line should be constructed with ample factors of safety and adequate reserve, and the highest type of construction sho

LOCATION OF NITRATE PLANTS

LOCATION OF NITRATE PLANTS.

The plants for the manufacture of nitrates used in the production of ammunition and fertilizers can be placed at any point within reasonable distance of Rock Island that may be thought desirable. The valley of the Hilmois River and the valley of the Rock River, which will be crossed by the transmission line, offer excellent locations for such plants. The plans here proposed permit of wide latitude in the selection of actual sites for these nitrate plants, in case it should be thought best not to locate them on the arsenal reservation and to still have them directly under the management and control of the arsenal authorities. The actual sites selected will, of course, depend upon the method or processe, or combination of processes, of manufacture finally decided upon by the United States Government and the general policy of administration determined upon.

Many processes have been developed for the manufacture of nitrates by artificial means. There is some uncertainty as to the best method to employ. This is due mostly to uncertainty as to the cost of the several methods, and exists mostly as to details of the several processes proposed. Practically all methods which have been used involve either the recovery of nitrogen from the coal deposits by the gasification or distillation of coal, or the recovery of nitrogen from the atmosphere by some one of several electric-power processes.

The nitrogen supply in the atmosphere is unlimited in amount and the product so obtained is unexcelled in purity. The supply of coal in this country, while enormous in extent, is limited, and once burned can never be restored. The fixed nitrogen obtained from coal in the form of ammonia is entirely suitable for fertilizers, without any special treatment. This source of supply will be used for ammunition only in case of emergency. Commercially the recovery of nitrogen from the atmosphere in the form of nitric acid suitable for the manufacture of ammunition or fertilizers, as desired, requires cheap power.

reduced by the development of water power now being wasted. Before the heat value of the coal is used in the steam-power plant its many valuable by-products, and especially its nitrogen content, will be extracted.

In the manner here proposed the truest and highest grade of conservation of natural resources is accomplished and at the same time a cheap and economical supply of nitrates is provided for use in the domestic industries or for the manufacture of ammunition.

The Rock Island Arsenal is located at the foot of the Rock Island Rapids of the Mississippi River and has an area of approximately 990 acres (see fig. I, map of Rock Island Arsenal). The Rock Island Rapids of the Mississippi River extend from the pool at Le Claire to slack water at Davenport, a distance of 14.8 miles.

At low water the difference in level between the Le Claire pool and the river at the Rock Island bridge is 20.73 feet. During the maximum recorded flood of 1880. with an estimated discharge of 251,348 cubic feet per second, the above-mentioned difference in levels was reduced to 16.13 feet. It is proposed to construct a dam above the railroad bridge between Davenport and the island of Rock Island, with a crest elevation of 21.63 feet above low water. This elevation will be increased to 27.63 feet by the use of automatic steel flash boards, which lower automatically to allow floods to pass by. In addition to the automatic flash boards, discharge gates will be placed in the dam to relieve flood conditions.

Careful gauge readings have been kept under the supervision of the United States Government, and from these records a discharge curve has been produced for the discharge of the Mississippi River at Rock Island. This curve is based upon the daily gauge readings taken at Rock Island. This curve is based upon the daily gauge readings taken at Rock Island for the 15 years extending from 1901 to 1915, inclusive.

The plan of development proposed contemplates the construction of adm and spillway between the island of Rock Island and the

ANNUAL COST OF OPERATION,

The estimated cost of construction is based upon the present high cost of materials and apparatus, due to the war conditions in Europe. It is assumed that money is worth 3 per cent to the United States Government. Depreciation charges are based upon the economical life of the apparatus employed. The cost of coal has been taken at $1 per ton at the mine. It is believed that this price can be realized, as low-grade and waste coal can be utilized.

and waste coal can be utilized.

It has been found that under the above conditions the most economical development of the water power at Rock Island will be approximately 100,000 kllowatts (135,000 horsepower). The estimated cost of constructing a 100,000-kllowatt power plant in accordance with the plans suggested will be $19,417,000, and the cost of power $8.26 per horsepower year. However, if a gas-producer plant is installed and the by-product sold, the cost of power will be reduced $2.16 per horsepower year.

the by-product sold, the cost of power will be reduced $2.16 per horse-power year.

From the above the great advantage of using a by-product gas-producer plant is self-evident. In the latter case both the water-power plant and the steam plant are run continuously, the reserves being placed in operation. The average load is thus increased from 100,000 kilowatts to 173,000 kilowatts. Under these conditions the load will be 200,000 kilowatts for a period of about two months, and will gradually fall off to approximately 130,000 kilowatts for a period of a few days.

A 30,000-kilowatt water-power development can be made at an estimated construction cost, including damages, of $7,955,550. The estimated annual costs will amount to $10.57 per kilowatt year, or $7.89 per horsepower year.

per horsepower year.

A 40,000-kilowatt water-power development with an auxiliary steam plant of corresponding size and a gas-producer plant can be constructed at an estimated cost of $11,663,090. In a plant of this size, operated at its full capacity, developing an average of $0,000 kilowatts throughout the year, the water-power deficiency being negligible, after due credit is made for the sale of by-products, power will be produced at an estimated cost of $6,54 per kilowatt, or $4.88 per horsepower.

CONCERTSION.

In the project here suggested for the development of the water power at Rock Island it is believed that approximately 200,000 horsepower for the nitrate plant to be constructed by the Government can be obtained under the conditions set forth, at a net cost to the Government of not in excess of $2.25 per horsepower year. The development of power can be extended to any amount desired.

On account of its central location, the fine labor market available, the unexcelled transportation facilities in all directions, both by rail and water, the safety of the location, and the fact that at Rock Island the Government has its finest and best located arsenal and largest arsenal reservation, it is urged that the location at Rock Island be given careful consideration in the selection of the location of the nitrate plant authorized to be constructed by Congress.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull] has offered an amendment which is now pending before the House. Later on, he is going to offer other amend-ments. In every case he is simply asking us to put in this bill the appropriations that the Chief of Ordnance and the War Department have asked for.

Now, the Speaker of the House has asked what are we going to do? We ought to have these Government plants working three shifts, as he suggests. We ought to give the War Department in this crisis everything it asks for, and then if it does not give us the guns and ammunition required, we can hold it responsible. But if these amendments are voted down in this committee, then the Committee on Military Affairs and this House will be responsible. I hope that every one of these amendments will be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 50, line 13, strike out "$12,000,000" and insert "$14,978,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. A division, Mr. Chairman, Mr. DALLINGER. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman, The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were-ayes 23, noes 34, So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided. That not more than one-third of this sum shall be expended in the purchase of the articles provided in this appropriation.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARDNER: Page 50, line 14, after the word "that," insert the words "in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, that amendment puts the burden where it belongs, of deciding how much of this ammunition ought to be bought and how much ought to be manufactured. It puts it exactly and squarely where it belongs-Secretary of War, not on the Chief of Ordnance.

As has been very well said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] a little while ago, the officers in the Army, men of the most honorable training and traditions, as fine men as I ever knew, find, whenever they pay a high price for ammunition, as they are obliged to do to-day, that they are sandbagged by somebody who says that they are "crooks." Frequently therefore they do not do their duty, and buy the ammunition in spite of criticism.

If the ordnance officers work two shifts in the arsenals, they know that the product is not going to be so good and that it is going to be more expensive, and that they are going to be criti-cized by the War Department and by Congress. They know that they are going to get it in the neck from everybody who is opposed to the Army. Anyone who has read the testimony knows that in the committee those who are opposed to the Army cross-question these officers, almost insult them, and treat them in a way that we would not treat each other. Of course, the result is that the officers find themselves in wrong whatever they do.

Now, my amendment puts the responsibility as to the extent of ammunition purchases exactly where it belongs-

Secretary of War.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am quite in sympathy with the gentleman's attitude toward the responsibility of the Army officer himself in this business; but is it not a fact that now under the operation of the War Department the Secretary of War is the legally responsible man for the placing of these matters?

Mr. GARDNER. He is legally responsible, and he is the man who ought to have the praise or the blame. We tie his hands with these limitations. Now, I say let us until his hands, because what we need is not argument, is not talk, is not excuses. What we need is ammunition and ordnance, and the only way to get it is to put in the hands of the Secretary of War the power to buy ammunition and ordnance in his discretion.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it provides in line 14 that in the discretion of the Secretary of War not more than one-third-that is the way I understand it to read.

Mr. GARDNER. At the discretion or in the discretion of the Secretary of War, not more than one-third.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of that is practically to destroy this proviso. The proviso states that not more than one-third, absolutely as a matter of law, shall be expended in the purchase of the articles provided for in the appropriation. To put in this amendment would simply mean that that proviso had no force or effect whatever. Now, we discussed this ques-tion in the committee, up one side and down another, and I confess that I have not any extreme views on this subject, have not the extreme views of some of the members of the committee that we ought to manufacture more than we do, but the committee reached the conclusion that we ought at least to limit this to one-third; and if you say that it shall be done in the discretion of the Secretary of War, you might as well strike out the proviso. That is exactly what it means. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it stated here that the using of three shifts in the making of ammunition or of guns is not practicable. I want to say as a practical man in that kind of work that it is. Every rolling mill of any consequence, every steel mill, every glass works, every munitions works in this country of any consequence, so far as I know, is working three shifts, where private manufacturers are operating. If the Government is not doing it, it shows that the Government is not capable of managing a factory in competition with outside work. It is stated here that the cost of making ammunition is 54 per cent less in Government factories than it can be purchased for from private manufacturers. I do not believe that. I do not believe the Government knows what it costs it in any instance to make articles in these Government factories, and I challenge the figures given. There is just about as much truth in that statement as there was in the statement made that armor plate could be manufactured by the Government at a certain figure. I proved by those figures that it would cost double the amount, and I challenged their method of getting their figures as to cost in Government manufacturing. The only way to prove such statements of cost is to have an outside auditing committee audit these costs and check them up, and that is never done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As I understand it, the gentleman is a practical manufacturer.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; a practical workman in such work. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to know if it is not as easy for the United States Government to run three shifts as it is for private manufacturers to run three shifts?

Mr. GARLAND. It certainly is; and, moreover, there is no difference in the men who work the shifts. All of these plants that work three shifts change the shifts every week, and every that work three shifts change the shifts every week, and every third week each shift works at night, and then, in turn, works in the daytime, each shift getting its turn. They are the same kind of men, living in the same way, acting in the same way, and there is no difference in their work. So far as the light is concerned, you have that difficulty to contend with on the two shifts, so there is not a thing in that. But the great trouble with your getting men is this, that you do not permit a system whereby men can be paid a premium for working. I live within two squares of one of the biggest shell-making factories in this country, and that is the Westinghouse Switch & Signal Works. They are working night and day, all the time, in the making of shells. Men who got $2.50 and $3 and $4 and $5 a day two years ago are now making shells and working the same hours that they worked there before, and are now making $10 to $15 a day for their work. It is true that their wages have been raised some, I think about 32 per cent, or perhaps three 10 per cent raises; but over and above that they are working on the premium system and have the right to work. They are not held back, and so they are enabled to make these large wages. If the Government expects to use the people's money properly, and expects to prepare for war, it should learn some of the plan of manufacture from the private manufacturers. It can be done. It is not hard to find out, if you go about it in the right way. [Applause.]

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] will not be adopted, because I believe it will mean that a larger proportion of these contracts will go to private manufacturers and a smaller proportion to the Government arsenals. If these contracts go to the Government arsenals the people will get a dollar's worth of preparedness for every dollar expended. If we are not prepared to-day as we should be, it is not because the American people have not been taxed the price of adequate preparedness, but because too many million dollars appropriated for preparedness have gone into the pockets of Mr. Morgan and Mr. Schwab and other munition makers in the form of excessive profits. I believe to leave it to the Secretary of War is to leave it to the heads of the Ordnance Department.

I know in some cases when you write a letter to the Secretary of War about these propositions, the letter that is signed by him in reply is dictated by the Chief of Ordnance. Therefore I hope that we will not leave this matter to the officers of the Ordnance Department, who are well known to be opposed to the Government manufacture and will not allow the Government arsenals to do any more work than they are actually compelled to and will give as large a proportion to the private munition makers as they can. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

Small-arms target practice: For manufacture and purchase of ammunition, targets, and other accessories for small-arms, hand, and machine-gun target practice and instructions; marksmen's medals, prize arms, and insignia for all arms of the service; and ammunition, targets, target materials, and other accessories which may be issued for small-arms target practice and instruction at the educational institutions and State soldiers' and sallors' orphans' homes to which issues of small arms are lawfully made, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, $2,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 23, after the word "instruction," insert the words "of able-bodied men capable of bearing arms."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment. The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows: Manufacture of arms: For manufacturing, repairing, procuring, and issuing arms at the national armories, $6,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 51, line 3, strike out the sum "$6,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,350,000."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, these figures that I have asked you to insert are, as I said before, the figures that are furnished by the War Department. Now, my object in asking you to put these figures here is that when the shortage comes, as it surely will come, if anything happens to this country within the next two years, we will know where to place the responsibility. We have heard a great deal of discussion on an amendment in regard to who is responsible for our arsenals not being run at their full capacity.

I want to say a few words on that.

The arsenals are not run at their full capacity because herehave been extremely stingy in dealing with the Ordnance Department. A year ago we asked you to give the Ordnance Department more officers. They were underofficered at that time, In the national-defense act you gave them practically twice as many officers as they had before. In this very bill you are now going to adopt you have placed at their disposal all these officers. It is the only department in the Army that has the privilege of calling all of the increments at the present time to their service.

Now, I believe we have dealt liberally with the Ordnance Department in the way of officers, and you ought to deal with them liberally in the way of money, and then hold them responsible for the result.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not a fact that they are not working the arsenal at Rock Island to its full capacity?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is true. There is no question about it. But, as I say, you can not create the machinery to start an arsenal in six months. They immediately started a small-arms factory that was standing idle in Rock Island when they got the appropriation, but they have not yet turned out one gun. Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iown. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman understand that in the sundry civil appropriation bill there is nearly $4,000,000 to modernize the Rock Island Arsenal?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understand that they have allowed the appropriation there for building field-artillery carriages, but that has nothing to do with the small-arms factory

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think perhaps the gentleman is not aware of the statement that I put in the RECORD that they have made 13,000 and odd rifles within the last eight months. They have the capacity to make 250,000, but they have not exer-

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the reason we want to give them the money and put instructions in the bill. I have an amendment drawn that will instruct them to run the arsenal at full speed, but you can not do it if you do not give them the

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not a fact that they have not used the money that we appropriated last year, and that they still have a large unused balance?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Because they could not call in men to operate the arsenal at once. You can not start the machinery It has taken the private manufacturers over two years to produce rifles for foreign countries.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman said that as quick as they gave them the money the last time they started up the arsenal, and yet they have not made a gun yet? Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What in Heaven's name have they been doing?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, it takes a long time to get things to working

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should say that it did. [Laugh-

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say in reply to that, as I said to the gentleman over there, that the private contractors have been trying to produce rifles for foreign countries, and they were equipped over two years ago, and they have not, up to a short time ago, turned out any rifles.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I understood the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tilson] correctly—I understand that he is an expert in this line-it takes about a year to prepare the jigs and dies.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the way to force the War Department to use our plants to full capacity is to appropriate all the money they could use if they were running at full capacity and then limit them in the use of that money on the outside, so that they could not spend a great lot of it outside.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. CALDWELL, Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they will not use the money they have got, what is the sense in giving them more?

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand that they have used it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it has been testified here tonight that they have $5,000,000 of that money on hand now.

Mr. CALDWELL. That money was appropriated two months after the fiscal year started, and the fiscal year is not over and will not be until July.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I want to state right here, in order to correct what seems to be an impression that has been made, it is true that the Army appropriation bill of last year was not approved until August 29; but it is also a fact that the money that was expended for the support of the Army between the 1st day of July and the date of the approval of the act came out of the appropriation that was approved on August 29.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. So that the money that was used for two months has come out of that appropriation. I think there has been a misconception of that, perhaps.

Mr. CALDWELL. Perhaps the chairman is right about that, but the fact still remains that the year is not up yet and that they still have some time in which to spend that money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.
Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not a fact that the testimony in the hearings showed that they would not use up all of this appropriation by July 1?
Mr. CALDWELL. I do not so understand it. If the gentleman can point it out, I will be glad to have him do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will get it and show it to the gentleman. Mr. CALDWELL. My recollection is otherwise. It seems to me that if we are going to prepare this country we must prepare it by making a supply of arms and ammunition, so that when our men respond to the country's call they will have some thing to fight with, and they can not fight unless they have the

Mr. GORDON. Is it not a fact that this bill carries more money than these arsenals can actually use?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think so.

Mr. GORDON. How much would it cost to run them?

Mr. CALDWELL. It does not make any difference how much it would cost to run them. If it costs ten times as much as this bill carries, if we need them we ought to have it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Was not it understood that the policy of this bill is to take care of the normal military establishment in normal times?

Mr. CALDWELL. Absolutely. Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And if any demand was made on us for any increase in the Army that increase would be taken care of by extra legislation?

Mr. CALDWELL. I so understand it, and these appropria-

Mr. CALDWELL. I so understand it, and these appropriations are upon a peace basis.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. How many rifles have we on hand?

Mr. CALDWELL. Something over 700,000 rifles.

Mr. GORDON. And in addition to that we have 300,000 Krags.

Mr. CALDWELL. But they do not shoot the same ammunition. The gentleman must understand that 700,000 rifles would not equip 700,000 men, because you must have a reserve supply to take care of the breakage, the loss, and so forth, so that when you start out with 700,000 pieces of small arms you must figure that you are only ready to equip, say, half a million men.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.
Mr. SLAYDEN. Is not the gentleman mistaken in saying that we have only 700,000 rifles? It seems to me that those are the figures given out two years ago, and that with the Springfields and the Krag-Jörgensens we have more than a million.

Mr. CALDWELL. We have more than a million, with those old rifles.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have in the neighborhood of 900,000 Springfields and those others besides.
Mr. SLAYDEN. I wondered if they

Mr. SLAYDEN. I wondered if they had gone back.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I have the exact figures for the increase in rifles. In three years it has been sixty-six thousand and some odd rifles that we have added— Springfield rifles.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What have they been doing all of that time? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They have been spending it for pistols or something else besides the manufacture of rifles.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We sold 10,000 the other day to Cuba, did we not?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not think they were service rifles. But there is a certain wastage all of the time in these rifles, and in my judgment we have not as many as we figure we have. We are not taking into account the wastage and destruction of these rifles in the hands of the soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Nebraska takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. We have seven hundred thousand and odd rifles.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have about 300 rounds of ammunition for each rifle.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a statement that perhaps will throw a little light on the subject mentioned by the Speaker. Gen. Crozier says that July 1 we will have on hand 850,000 modern Springfield rifles with which to equip an army. The $6,000,000 appropriated in this bill for the manufacture of small arms will manufacture 200,000 more in the next year. That will make 1,000,000 modern Springfield rifles we will have on hand at the end of next year. We have 800,000 practically now. We will have 850,000 by July 1. In addition we have 350,000 serviceable Krag-Jörgensen rifles, which brings up a total of 1,200,000 rifles now on hand and 1,400,000 next year, so that, in my opinion, we have all this country will ever need in event of an emergency or if confronted by a foreign foe.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this, and I think I am right, that the statement he makes of 200,000 in the next year is erroneous; it is 400,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, Gen. Crozier said he intended to manufacture 200,000 within the next year, and I take his figure

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it not a fact the Krags of which the gentleman speaks use a different ammunition from the present service rifle

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but we have got a considerable supply of Krag ammunition now on hand to supply those rifles.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will ask the gentleman if Gen. Crozier himself also testified that on the 30th day of next June he would have on hand 381,000,000 rounds of small-arms ammuni-

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe he did, and he said if he could get the appropriation he asks for small-arms ammunition, and they were given practically the amount asked for, he intended to have over a billion rounds of small-arms ammunition on hand.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not also true we increased the amount of rifle ammunition only 27,000,000 in an entire year? Is not that the testimony?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is due to sluggishness on the part of the department, undoubtedly; but Gen. Crozier told us, and I believe it is true, that with the tremendous capacity in this country to-day with the private manufacturers we could turn out unlimited quantities of either small arms or small-arms ammunition, and there was not the slightest danger in any emergency that this country might be confronted with in which we could not provide ourselves almost instantly with an abundant supply of small arms and ammunition, and I do not think the House ought to consume time in worrying about that proposition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.
Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the Springfield Armory turning out now?

Mr. ANTHONY. I could not tell at the moment without

Mr. KAHN. They expect to manufacture 700 a day with the appropriation of this year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If I did not mistake the gentleman, his first statement was that by the 1st of July of this year there would be 200,000 more

Mr. ANTHONY. No; there would be 850,000 altogether by the 1st of July, and they can manufacture at the Government arsenals, I understand, a thousand a day if pushed to their full

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman think we can fight this war with rifles that are made next year?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are turning out thousands now; there are half a dozen private manufacturers in the country

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Our rifle, the service rifle?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; but they can do it.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit, the figures given me by the War Department show in seven days the operation of the arsenals. The gentleman from California said they can make all the rifles in a year. What assurance do we have that they will make them any faster next year than last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose the War Department appreciates the present conditions and their responsibilities, and that the arsenals will henceforth be used to their utmost capacity.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Under the spur of necessity they could make them faster

Mr. ANTHONY. I think they are now better equipped, with the abundance of money which Congress has provided last year and will again provide this year.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield as to the abundance of money? The fact is last year they only provided

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say the testimony before the committee shows that this committee and Congress has been liberal, and it is a fact that in many instances the War Department has not yet been able to expend or contract for all the money we furnished them with in last year's appropriations.

Mr. GARDNER. That is true; but here is a letter from the Secretary of War to me on the 22d of January, in which he says he is only getting 736,000 rifles-

Mr. ANTHONY. What kind—small arms? Mr. GARDNER. Rifles, of course; small arms, not field artillery. And 110,000 more authorized, at an expense of $3,700,000

Mr. KAHN.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman— The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas

[Mr. Anthony] has expired.
Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, Gen. Crozier testified before the committee, and his testimony is found on page 888 of the hearings, as follows:

At the end of this fiscal year, by the 30th of June, I shall expect to have on hand between $25,000 and $50,000.

Mr. KAHN. Does that include the Krags?

Gen. CROZIER. No. sir.

Then Mr. McKellar asks:

Then Mr. McKellar asks:

What is the capacity of our plants per year, running two shifts? How many could we manufacture?

Gen. Crozier. That depends a little on how we use them. I have stated before this committee several times that with a single shift the capacity of our two plants was 750 rifles per day. I think right here I ought to explain that that capacity never has been realized, and I think never will be realized, for the following reasons: It contemplates that the plant at those two factories shall not be used for the manufacture of spare parts or for repairs, or for any other purpose than the manufacture of rifles.

Mr. McKellar. With two shifts a day, how many rifles could we manufacture, together with the spare parts?

Gen. Crozier. At the Springfield Armory we could manufacture running two shifts, about 700 rifles a day, and at the Rock Island Arsenal we could manufacture about one-half that number.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit an in-

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KAHN.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to show the inaccuracy of the War Department. In the first one you read, he said the capacity of two arsenals running at two shifts was 700.

Mr. KAHN. Running at two shifts it was about 1,000 per

Then, on page 893, Gen. Crozier says:

I expect to manufacture with this appropriation something over 200,000 rifles, and I expect to purchase about 5,000.

So the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Anthony] was exactly right when he gave his figures to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows: .

Provided, That not more than 20 per cent of this sum shall be expended in the purchase of arms.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, simply for the purpose of saying that in each one of these limitations I should have offered an amendment putting the limitation in the discretion of the Secretary of War, but inasmuch as the House does not want that limitation I shall not offer it.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Gen. Crozier stated before the committee that all he intends to purchase out of the appropriation is 5,000, which is infinitely less than 20 per cent.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the pro forma amendment; and the Clerk will

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores and supplies: For overhauling, cleaning, repairing, and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores in the hands of troops and at the arsenals, posts, and depots; for purchase and manufacture of ordnance stores to fill requisitions of troops; for Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery equipments, including horse equipments for Cavalry and Artillery, $10,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment: On page 51, line 22, strike out "$10,000,000" and insert "$16,515,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HULL).

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

National trophy and medals for rifle contests: For the purpose of furnishing a national trophy and medals and other prizes to be provided and contested for annually, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, said contest to be open to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the National Guard or Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and of the District of Columbia, members of rifle clubs, and civilians, and for the cost of the trophy, prizes, and medals herein provided for, and for the promotion of rifle practice throughout the United States, including the reimbursement of necessary expenses of members of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, to be expended for the purposes hereinbefore prescribed under the direction of the Secretary of War, $10,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a somewhat lengthy question. Last week, as I recall it, in the Navy bill there was a provision inserted which, in effect, permitted the Secretary of the Navy to commandeer all factories in the United States or any sort of an establishment that made anything that could go into Navy appliances, and it was the general understanding we would have some sort of the same legislation relating to the Army.

Mr. KAHN. That is in the national-defense act.

Mr. BENNET. There is a provision in the national-defense act, but I am not sure it goes as far as the Navy bill. If it does it points what I am about to say. As I remember, the naval bill—and the only time I saw it was when it came before the Committee on Rules—the limitation on that right to commandeer was that the President could not do it except as money was appropriated beforehand by Congress. If these limitations remain in this bill in another place, then all this talk that has gone out to the country about everything we are going to do about seizing private establishments for preparation is simply "thundering in the index," because if you have limited the amount that can be spent to one-third, or 20 per cent, of the appropriation, the President can not commandeer anything, and we have been misleading the people of the United States.

Mr. KAHN. It is section 120 of the national-defense act.

Mr. BENNET. Yes. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if we ought not to correct that information that has gone out to the people, that in a broad-minded, patriotic, self-sacrificing way we have laid open all the manufacturing establishments of the United States to the commandeering power of the President of the United States, when, as a matter of fact, we have only opened them to the extent of one-third, or 20 per cent, of the amount we have appropriated in the various bills?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BENNET. Certainly.
Mr. KAHN. Of course, in this bill immediate war is not contemplated. It is a bill to take care of the Army in peace times. I take it that the moment war should be declared-

Mr. BENNET. If it should—
Mr. KAHN. If it should be declared, necessary legislation would be immediately enacted by Congress, giving a great deal of money for the manufacture and purchase of the necessary machinery to carry on the war.

Mr. BENNET. But am I not correct in the belief that despite the words of the statute, which the gentleman from Massachusetts has placed in my hand, the limitations that have been placed on these various appropriations do, without further legislation, limit the commandeering power of the President to

Mr. BENNET. Of course, we never appropriate for more than one year, and under the Constitution we could not appropriate for the Army for more than two years.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The commandeering paragraph, so called, in the national-defense act specifically states that it applies only in time of war or in imminence of war; so that it has no relation to this bill, and-

Mr. BENNET. So that the idea that has gone abroad, that we have in a sweeping way placed in the power of the President the right to commandeer in time of emergency, is subject to two limitations, if the gentleman is correct—that it only operates in time of war; and, second, that it applies only to these things that we are passing to-night, or only to the extent of one-third and, in some instances, 20 per cent of the appropriation?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, in section 120 of the national-defense act the gentleman will see that the President is empowered to do certain things in time of war or in imminence of war; and down in the latter part of this provision the President is-Hereby authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants and, through the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to manufacture therein in time of war or when war shall be imminent such products or material as may be required; and any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or responsible head or heads thereof failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. BENNET. But the President can not do that without a prior appropriation. I am not saying that dogmatically, but am stating it with a view to securing information. Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It applies only to a situation in time of war or in imminence of war. It was the policy in framing this bill to provide only for the normal peace establishment. That provision in the national-defense act has nothing to do with peace conditions. In that contingency—in time of war or in imminence of war—we would take the restrictions off this bill and open up as much money as the Nation might

Mr. BENNET. So that if war should take place between now and the next regular session of Congress you would have to have a special session of Congress to make appropriations before section 120 of the national-defense act would be practicable?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It would be a deficiency, of course. Mr. GARDNER. As a matter of fact, in the fortifications law we had a proviso to the effect that " whenever in the opinion of the President an emergency exists affecting the welfare of the United States he may waive the limitations contained in

Mr. BENNET. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to offer that as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. GARDNER. I will offer it in the proper place or let the gentleman offer it.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Massachusetts discovered I will offer it if it has nothing to do with immigration,

Mr. KAHN. It is not in order at this place in the bill, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from California says it is not in order at this point in the bill, and he is correct. I will not offer it now, as it is not pertinent to this part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever in the opinion of the President an emergency exists affecting the general welfare of the United States, he may waive the limitations contained in this act.

Mr. BENNET. It is a perfectly good amendment, I see, as it is read. I had not read it before I offered it. I give notice that at the proper time I will offer it.

TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago stated that I had heard Gen. Crozier testify that he was paying private manufacturers 54 per cent more for caissons than the cost of manufacturing them at the Rock Island Arsenal. gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Garland] stated that he did not believe it had been done. I have looked up the testimony of Gen. Crozier, which I had in mind when I spoke, and desire to call it to the attention of the House at this time, when we are in the mood to consider this question. On January 13, 1912, Gen. Crozier, testifying before a special committee of the House of Representatives appointed to investigate the Taylor system, page 1118 of the hearings, said:

page 1118 of the hearings, said:

We have recently manufactured gun carriages, and are doing it still, for 3-inch rifles—that is, field guns—at $2,510.60, the exact cost. We purchased those rifle carriages from experienced manufacturers, who had had preceding orders for the same thing, for $3,398.82, an increase of 35.4 per cent over our own price. Our carriages were made at the Rock Island Arsenal.

We have manufactured there, at the same arsenal, caissons for $1,128.67, and we have purchased the same caissons from private manufacturers who had had previous orders for them, so that they had experience in the manufacture, for $1,744.10, which is 54.6 per cent greater than our own price.

On page 1117 of the same hearings Gen. Crozier stated as follows:

At the Springfield Armory the principal manufacture is small-arms rifles. We make a few other things, but the manufacture is almost entirely of the small-arms rifle. We manufacture that rifle for about $15, and in doing so I take into account what I think should properly be taken into account in the cost; but the Springfield Armory, like the other arsenals, is maintained as an arsenal of storage and issue, as well as a manufacturing place; and, therefore, in computing these costs. I have subtracted from the total expense of the Springfield Armory those portions which I consider result from its character as an arsenal of issue and storage. Unless somebody goes into the details quite closely, there may be a question as to whether I subtract quite as much as I ought to.

I am reading this to make it plain that when we state on the floor that we are manufacturing things at arsenals at a certain figure that the given arsenal cost includes overhead charges of every description. Of course we do not charge taxes, because the Government does not pay any.

Mr. FARR. For information, how much money has the Government invested in the works to which the gentleman is now referring?

Mr. TAVENNER. Some $14,000,000, offhand.

Mr. FARR. Do you count 6 per cent on that $14,000,000?
Mr. TAVENNER. No. We count 3 per cent interest, because that is all the Government has to pay; but I have never been able to understand why we should charge any interest. We are not paying any.

Mr. FARR. The people have to pay it.

Mr. TAVENNER. Who do they pay it to? The sums appropriated for the arsenals from year to year are taken out of the money that we are collecting from year to year from tariff taxes and other Government revenues. Anyway, 3 per cent is charged as interest on the total investment.

Mr. FARR. On the $14,000,000?

Mr. TAVENNER. Yes; and distributed over the various articles manufactured there. Three per cent interest is charged. Mr. FARR. Does this gentleman whom you are quoting now mention the interest charges as part of the overhead charges?

Mr. TAVENNER. Yes; he says 3 per cent is charged on the total investment, also on all material that is being used in the manufacture of these munitions. For instance, suppose there should be a million dollars' worth of copper or other material on hand, he charges against the arsenal the interest on the value of that material in the course of manufacture. In fact, they charge every possible thing as overhead, because they do not want to make it appear that we are manufacturing these things too cheaply, because they apparently do not want to give any more contracts than absolutely necessary to the Government arsenals.

Mr. FARR. The gentleman will concede, then, that the private manufacturer pays at least 3 per cent more than is allowed in the charge for interest against Government plants?

Mr. TAVENNER. Yes. I do not say that the private manufacturer does not have to pay more interest than the Government; he does; but the issue is this: Why should we pay from 15 to 50 per cent more to private manufacturers for $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 worth of munitions than we can manufacture them for in Government arsenals? Why not do it in the Government plants, so that we will get as much preparedness as possible for the money we spend? You will find that if you will take the private profit out of this thing, so that we can get a dollar's worth of preparedness for every dollar appropriated, there will not be so much deserved opposition to preparedness.

Mr. FARR. I am not in disagreement with the gentleman on that. I am simply trying to find out what the overhead statement:

Therefore, I, last year, for the purpose of satisfying some persons who might have some doubt, made up what I might call an exaggerated cost of the rifles at the Springfield Armory—that is, I took every cent of money that was sent up to the Springfield Armory and charged it to the rifle. Whether it was for the payment of the clerks that were used in the issue of stores, the payment of the storehouse force, whether it was for the payment of the watchmen—they are the guards and custodians of the valuable property we have up there—I charged all the pay of officers and all the pay of everybody concerned to the rifle, and by that means I arrived at a cost of the rifle of $17.64 instead of $15—that is, I found I had to add to the cost as I had reported it about 17 per cent. Now, that then became a statement of an exaggerated cost which, whatever the rifle might cost properly, it could not possibly reach. It must have been below $17.65; and if it were possible to obtain the opinion of an expert, I would be glad to ask him if he thought the Springfield rifle could be produced by anybody else anywhere and purchased for $25. My own opinion is that you could not get it as low as $25 from any manufacturer.

On April 2, 1912, Gen. Crozier stated as follows before a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives relative to the cost of manufacture at the Rock Island Arsenal—see pages 637-638 of hearings:

Island Arsenal—see pages 637-638 of hearings:

The Chairman. Do your figures show the comparative cost of manufacture and purchase?

Gen. Crozier. Yes.

The Chairman. Put them in the record, please.
Gen. Crozier. I will mention a few of them for the record. I think I can mention them more summarily, so they can be better comprehended in the record, than if I put in all of these details. I will take the limbers for the 3-inch rifles. The average of three contracts gave a price of $1,518 aplece for those limbers.

Mr. Cannon. What is a limber?

Gen. Crozier. A limber is the forward portion of the wagon which transports the gun, the forward portion of the gun carriage; and the average of five orders for manufacture at the Rock Island Arsenal was $684 apiece. The arsenal cost was less than half the purchase price.

Gen. Crozier. Now, for the 3-inch caisson, the average of five contracts shows a price of $1,708, and the average of six manufacturing orders given to the Rock Island Arsenal is $1,081. The 3-inch gun carriage proper—that is, the vehicle on which the gun rests and from which it is fired—gives as the average price three contracts, $3,208, and the average cost under five manufacturing orders at the arsenal was $2,241.

Mr. CANNON. Does that include overhead charges? Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, may authorize the detail of enlisted men of the Army as temporary instructors in rifle practice to organized rifle clubs requesting such instruction.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I wish to inquire what is meant by authorizing the detail of enlisted men of the Army as temporary instructors in rifle practice to organized rifle clubs requesting such instruction? How generally is it proposed to have enlisted men in the Army traveling about the country visiting these camps, and for how long are they supposed to be detailed at these various rifle clubs?

Mr. DENT. Of course there is nothing in this proposition as it appears in the bill which answers the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin. That amendment was offered at the suggestion of a member of the committee, because it was thought that the Secretary of War in his discretion could take an enlisted man from the Army who happened to be at a post near where some rifle club was organized and send him over there to give temporary instruction. It confers the discretion on the Secrefary of War, and it is absolutely within his power and authority to determine when he will exercise this right. and when he will detail a man for that purpose. Of course it will all depend on how close the enlisted man is to the rifle club, and on various other circumstances. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], who is the author of the standing than perhaps it otherwise might have.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] is the author of it, that gives it more dignity and

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In the five minutes allotted to me I can not hope to reply to such flattery as that. The fact is that an instance was brought to my attention only a little while ago where a civilian rifle club was organized near an Army post. This club was composed, I think, of about a thousand splendid young men, physically capable of bearing arms, and having a great deal of military enthusiasm. They wanted to have an opportunity to take advantage of instruction by one or two veteran soldiers, expert marksmen. They applied for the detail of one or two of these marksmen, and while the department was perfectly willing it was found that technically there was no authority under which a soldier could be detailed for that purpose. So it was thought that such a provision as this, carefully safeguarded, by putting it in the discretion of the Secretary of War under such rules and regulations as he might prescribe would give them an opportunity to have what appears to a reasonable man to be merely an accommodation in the public interest, and particularly in the general scheme of educating civilians for national defense.

Mr. DENT. In other words, the committee decided that certainly no harm could grow out of it and possibly some good.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that there should be some further limitation so that the enlisted men can only be detailed to a near-by rifle club and so that the Secretary of War, even in peace times, could not send enlisted men all over the country to rifle clubs for the purpose of instruction. I will inquire of the gentleman from Vermont what is necessary, as far as rifle instruction is concerned: I used a rifle in my early days and I didn't need instruction. I was able to hit a small bull's-eye after a little practice.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. All one has to do is to stand up with a sporting rifle and aim at a sporting target and then take a military rifle and take the ranges necessary for that practice with a military rifle to learn that there is a practical difference which in most instances can only be overcome by instructions from experts.

Mr. CALDWELL. Experience shows that the average man that enlists, who has the interest to enlist, can not use a military rifle any better than a man who never had a gun in his hand before.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to deputing a man to a near-by rifle range, but I do not think we ought to send enlisted men all around the country on, perhaps, junkets for the purpose of being attached to some rifle range that may be in practice only one day in the month.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I suggested to the Committee on Military Affairs about two weeks ago the wisdom of inserting in this bill a provision of this character. At the time I called upon the Military Affairs Committee I had with me Capt. Cassatt, of my congressional district.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is he the son of the late A. J. Cassatt, former president of the Pennsylvania Railroad?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; and permit me to say that he was my adversary in the late disturbance I had in my congressional district. [Laughter.] He and a number of other gentlemen living in and about my home, feeling greatly interested in making some preparation for the future military service at their own expense established two rifle ranges and gun clubs. Within six or eight months they had a membership of seven or eight hundred. Each member paid $1 for the privilege of belonging to the club and at the same time being taught to shoot. They have provided themselves with guns and ammunition, and to the best of their ability they have turned out within six months nearly 700 marksmen. They are not at all sure that the work they have done has been well done and according to the requirements which the Army might impose They expect within the next three or four months to increase the membership to 1,200 or 1,500. They are young men from all around the neighborhood who come in to learn to shoot. I have said that they established two ranges. They ask nothing for the ranges, but they want some one, some noncommissioned officer or private soldier, to come to the range and give the men further instructions and to instruct others.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, upon the statement made by the military expert on the Republican side, supplemented by the naval expert on the Republican side, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amend-

"For the payment of transportation of teams authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in the national matches, $60,000: Provided, That this amount shall be proportioned among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to the distance from the seat of government to the place where the national matches are to be held: And provided further, That the governors of the States or Territories or the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate which team or teams shall attend from their respective States, Territories, or District of Columbia."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. KAHN. I make the point of order.

Mr. SEARS. This amendment was contained in the bill of last year and year before last. It is not new legislation. I clipped the amendment out of the bill of last year for fear some Member might say it was new legislation.

Mr. KAHN. There is a provision that takes care of the national trophies and medals for rifle contests, and I do not see why we should duplicate that work. I therefore make the point

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Florida any au-

Mr. SEARS. I have not looked up any authorities, Mr. Chairman, as I presumed, this being a preparedness proposition, there would be no point of order raised.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is raised the burden is on the gentleman.

Mr. SEARS. It seems unless a preparedness proposition involves $10,000,000 it is impossible to get an amendment

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Automatic machine rifles: For the purchase, manufacture, and test of automatic machine rifles, including their sights and equipments, to be immediately available and remain available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $3,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, on page 53, line 5, I move to strike out "$3,000,000" and insert "$7,350,000." The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 5, strike out "$3,000,000" and insert "$7,350,000,"

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to debate the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Automatic machine rifles for National Guard: For the purchase, manufacture, and test of automatic machine rifles, including their sights and equipments, for the National Guard, to be immediately available and to remain available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $2,500,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, on page 53, line 18, I move to amend by striking out the figures "$2,500,000" and inserting "$11,789,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 18, strike out "$2,500,000" and insert "$11,789.000." The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Antiaircraft guns: For the procurement and test of antiaircraft guns, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments, to be immediately available and to remain available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $250,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting in line 20, page 53, after the word "sights" the word searchlights."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment,

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 20, after the word "sights" insert the word "search-lights."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the reason I propose this amendment, and I hope the committee will accept it, is that an antiaircraft gun is absolutely useless unless you have it equipped with the necessary searchlights to locate the aircraft, because the aircraft operates most extensively in the nighttime, and under the circumstances, in view of the fact that in the places where these guns will be located they have no searchlights, we ought to provide them with the necessary searchlights out of this appropriation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the searchlight made necessary for use with the antiaircraft gun not provided for in some other appropriation in the bill?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not that I know of. I want to have the necessary words in there so that if they find it necessary they can buy them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman does not understand there is any peculiar searchlight that goes as a fixture of

Mr. CALDWELL. No; but it must be one of extremely high power.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Those searchlights are provided in other appropriations for any use the Army may have to make of them.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield. Mr. KAHN.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. Mr. KAHN. The Engineer's Department furnishes searchlights, and they have searchlights now that throw the rays 13,000 yards.

Mr. CALDWELL. This can do no harm. They are not spending it unless they want to.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that the language of this paragraph is exactly the language recommended by Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. 1es.
Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman suggests that it will do no harm. It does harm to this extent, that if you authorize it here you merely reduce the amount that may be available for the purchase of the various items included in the paragraph.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the amount is too small, and I expect to offer another amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the use of providing in two items of a bill for the same objects?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not know of any place in the bill where provision is made for purchasing the necessary searchlights for defense guns against aerial machines. Therefore I insist upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 23, page 53, the sum of "$250,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$1,250,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 23, page 53, strike out "$250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,250,000."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the reason I do that is this: On January 3, 1917, Gen. Crozier appeared before our committee, and it was then for the first time, so far as I know, that the question of defense guns against aircraft was brought up by any committee or by any department of the War Department or of the Navy. While it was stated here a few moments ago that Mr. Kahn was the person who first suggested it, Mr. KAHN was the person who suggested this

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I made the statement that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] did make this suggestion. I was not entirely accurate about that, and I desire to correct it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Caldwell] brought the subject out at the hearings, and the gentleman from California [Mr. Kahn], when we were preparing the bill and were about to overlook this proposition, suggested that we were about to omit it and brought it in.

Correct statement.
Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I asked Gen. Crozier at that time if it was not desirable that we protect our arsenals and supply stations, and he said that it was. I asked him if he would not prepare a clause to go into the bill and make a statement showing how many of these guns we ought to have, and what they cost, and Gen. Crozier was kind enough to do that, and the clause that he prepared is the clause that is in the bill.

The statement that he made was as follows. I read from page 886:

For the procurement and test of antiaircraft guns, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments, to be immediately available and to remain available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $1,275,000.

At the present prices it is estimated that antiaircraft guns and mounts of 3-inch caliber, which would be proper for defense of ordnance stations, would cost $12,500 each. The more important ordnance stations should each have eight or more of these guns and the smaller from four to six. The total required on this basis would be:

Eight each for the Frankford, Watertown, and Watervilet Arsenals, 10 for Picatinny, 10 for Springfield Armory, or a total for the more important stations of 44.

Two for Augusta Arsenal and 4 for the Sandy Hook Proving Ground, a total of 6.

Six each for the Benicia Arsenal and the New York Arsenal, a total

Six each for the Benicia Arsenal and the New York Arsenal, a total

Six each for the Manila Ordnance Depot, the Panama Ordnance Depot, and the Hawaiian Ordnance Depot, a total of 18.

This makes a total of 80, which, at $12,500 each, would make the total estimate $1,000,000.

And, with the necessary supplies, $1,200,000; and I hope this amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I think my colleague from New York [Mr. Caldwell] is in error when he makes the statement that provision is not made for the development of antiaircraft guns. Such provision has been made in other appropriation bills, and for the last two years the Navy Department and the Ordnance Department of the Army have been developing such a gun for the purposes of defense against aircraft for the use of the Coast Artillery and for the use of the Navy. Now, this appropriation the committee has made of $250,000 in this bill for antiaircraft guns, in my opinion, is the only place where the committee has slopped over in the preparation of its bill. It is the intention of the War Department to place these antiaircraft guns even at such ridiculous places as Rock Island Arsenal, 1,500 miles inland from the seacoast, for the purpose of protecting that arsenal from the raid of aircraft of a foreign enemy. Now, it would be perfectly proper, in my opinion, to plant such guns along the seacoast, but the idea of equipping the interior arsenals and posts with antiaircraft guns is carrying the proposition to the extreme. Yet I am willing that they should have $250,000 for the development of such guns, but I am utterly opposed to making such increase as the gentleman from New York suggests, because it is unnecessary.

Mr. BUTLER. How far from the Canadian border is the arsenal of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. ANTHONY. About 1,000 or 800 miles.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is mistaken in suggesting it is the intention to put guns at Rock Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. To put some guns at Rock Island.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will allow me, Gen. Crozier said that there is estimated 8 each for the Frankford, Watertown, and Watervliet Arsenals; 10 for Picatinny; 10 for Springfield Armory, or a total for the more important stations of 44. Two for Augusta Arsenal and 4 for the Sandy Hook Proving Grounds, a total of 6. Six each for the Benicia Arsenal and the New York Arsenal, a total of 12. Six each for the Manila Ordnance Depot, the Panama Ordnance Depot, and the Hawaiian Ordnance Depot, a total of 18. It does not mention Rock Island at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. Some of the testimony that I read bearing on the subject it occured to me there was a provision made for Rock Island, and I am glad to hear the gentleman say there is no such provision. I think $250,000 in the bill amply sufficient to develop that type of gun for the purpose of the Army.

Mr. FARR. How long does it take to make one of these guns?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Army has not made any of those guns yet. I understand they are simply in the process of development yet; but other branches-

Mr. FARR. We have some.
Mr. ANTHONY (continuing). Have developed them—the Navy and the Coast Artillery.

Mr. FARR. Are those 1 or 3 inch guns? Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know. Mr. FARR. Nothing definite?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. FARR. Does the gentleman think we ought to have

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I do not believe so. I do not believe it is necessary. I do not believe we will ever be threatened by an aerial attack from a foreign enemy.

Mr. FARR. Has the gentleman been reading any of Admiral Peary's statements?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think Admiral Peary's statement ridiculous, and it belittled Admiral Peary in my estimation.

Mr. FARR. The gentleman does not think a ship can come within 300 miles of the coast and turn off several aeroplanes? Mr. ANTHONY. Not as long as the American Navy is Those ships carrying foreign aeroplanes will never come within 300 miles of the American coast.

Mr. FARR. How near the American coast have these socalled raiders come which have destroyed so many ships?

Mr. ANTHONY. Nobody knows. No raider of a foreign country would have ever ventured into those seas when the American Navy was on the lookout.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman is very opti-

Mr. ANTHONY. Not optimistic, but trying to exercise a little practical sense.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think for the most part the gentleman does.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I just wanted to suggest, a little while ago we might have refused to make an appropriation for a net to stretch across the mouth of some harbor, claiming that no submarine would ever cross the ocean; but now we take it as a matter of fact.

Now, the same possibilities exactly lie in the use of flying craft by the invasion of a foreign enemy.

Mr. ANTHONY. A year ago we were scared to death about the Zeppelin airship. To-day all military authorities agree that as a vehicle of offense it is absolutely useless.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We are not talking about Zep-pelins now.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are talking about antiaircraft guns. Mr. FARR. The antiaircraft gun is what made the Zeppelin ineffective.

Mr. KAHN. That is it exactly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is a good answer for the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment that increases this appropriation $1,000,000 will not be adopted. This is the first time a provision of this kind has appeared in the Army appropriation bill. This matter is in the experimental stage. I agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Anthony] that we have amply provided for the experiment in the appropriation provided by the committee.

Mr. FARR. For how much does the amendment call?

Mr. DENT. One million dollars,

Mr. FARR. It ought to be $1,000,000 or, at least, $500,000.

The gentleman from Kansas intimated that the Zeppelin became ineffective after the development of the antiaircraft gun. My information is that we have not any conception of the damage which was done in London and in other towns in England by the Zeppelins until the antiaircraft gun was developed, and as the result of the utilization of that gun, which could shoot 3 or 4 miles in the air, the Zeppelins have proven useless.
Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Where is the Zeppelin going to come from? Mr. FARR. I am talking about the Zeppelins across the ocean.

Mr. GORDON. I am talking about the United States.

Mr. FARR. If we should have war with one of these splendidly developed countries we would see something of the Zeppelin or other aircraft.

Mr. GORDON. We would not see the Zeppelin on this side of the Atlantic, though. Mr. FARR. We might.

Mr. GORDON. How could it get here? Mr. FARR. It could come from Canada, and I do not think it would be so difficult for airships to cross the ocean. After this war is over we will see airships in abundance coming across the ocean and going from here across the Atlantic.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield? With all deference to the experience and knowledge of my friend from Kansas [Mr. Anthony] I think he made an inadvertent admission there when he said that the reason that the Zeppelins could do no harm was by reason of the development of an antiaircraft gun. It was not that, as reported by the technical journals, but because of the swift, high-power aeroplanes that had been developed, which could quickly rise and get above the Zeppelins and destroy them,

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] just stated that the antiaircraft gun was an experiment. It has not been an experiment in Europe.

Mr. DENT. I was speaking of the fact that it was an experiment in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.
Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding after the word "guns," in line 20, page 53, the words "and de-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 20, after the word "guns" insert the words " and devices."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bennet].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ammunition for antialreraft guns: For the procurement and test of animunition for antialreraft guns, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, to be immediately available and to remain available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $200,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee, does he not think that the words "and devices" ought to go in after the word "guns" in line 25, page 53? It will not do any harm and would do some

I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. BENNET. I offer the amendment, then, to insert after the word "guns" in line 25, page 53, the words "and devices."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not more than experimental? Is it not ephemeral?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Benner].

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 54, line 4, by striking out the figures "$200,000" and inserting "$1,200,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 4, strike out "$200,000" and insert "$1,200,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected, The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Field artillery for National Guard: For the purpose of manufacturing and procuring field artillery material for the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, but to remain the property of the United States and to be accounted for in the manner now prescribed by law, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, on the requisitions of the governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, to issue said artillery material to the National Guard; and the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated and made immediately available and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1919, for the manufacture, procurement, and issue of the articles constituting the same, $10,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. On line 19, page 54, strike out the figures "$10.000,000" and insert the figures "$14,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 19, strike out the figures "$10,000,000" and insert "$14,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 54, line 19, the figures "$10,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Mann: On page 54, line 19, strike out the figures "$10,000,000."

Mr. MANN. I do not know why that has been inserted here. It is not necessary to repeat the amount of an appropriation and insert it twice in a paragraph. While it is very common to put the amounts in the various provisions in a paragraph and put the total amount at the end of the paragraph, it is not customary, where you make a specific appropriation in a paragraph of $10,000,000, to add "$10,000,000" at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman. I had not noticed it before. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would it not be better to strike out the figures "$10,000,000" in line 15 rather than at the end of Mr. MANN. No. That would require a redrafting of the provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order on that, and since then the Chair has accepted two amendments. do not know whether my point of order is in order now or not. The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is still pending. The Chair said that the point of order had been reserved.

Mr. BORLAND. The point of order is that the appropriation extends over a longer period than two years. The Constitution says that an appropriation for the Army shall not extend longer than two years.

Mr. MANN. It does not extend beyond two years.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; it does. It says it is immediately available and will remain available until the end of the fiscal

Now, it seems to me that the Committee on Military Affairs do not want to violate the Constitution, or to violate even the spirit of that provision of the Constitution. It is a very insignificant infraction of the constitutional provision, but it seems to me that the committee ought to keep within the provisions of the Constitution. There is no reason for making it immediately available.

Mr. GARDNER. Why does not the gentleman offer an amendment?

Is this an appropriation for the Army?

Mr. BORLAND. The mere fact that it is made immediately available makes it unconstitutional.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is for the support of the Army., Mr. MANN. I doubt that. I asked the gentleman's opinion on it, on the constitutional question only. Of course the item is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. It would seem to me, without looking at the precedents, that the support of the National Guard is a part of the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 17, the word "nineteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighteen."

Mr. DENT. I move to strike out the words, in lines 15 and 16, "made immediately available and to remain available."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Dent: Page 54, beginning with line 15, strike out the words "made immediately available and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1919."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask leave to change that amendment so as to strike out of the paragraph the words "to remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1919."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 16, strike out the words "to remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1919."

Mr. BORLAND. I withdraw the point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what became of my amendment?
The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois was agreed to. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] offered an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was covered by the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Ammunition for field artillery for the National Guard: For the purpose of manufacturing and procuring reserve ammunition for field artillery for the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, the funds to be immediately available, and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $10,000,000: Provided, That not more than $200,000 of this appropriation may be used to procure gauges, dies, figs, tools, fixtures, and other special aids and appliances, including specifications and detailed drawings necessary for the manufacture by private manufactures of field artillery ammunition necessary for the use of the land forces of the United States in time of war, and in the purchase of lots of ammunition to complete the object of this proviso the existing laws prescribing competition in the procurement of supplies by purchase shall not govern in orders not to exceed $50,000 in any one case $10,000,000.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 24, after the word "available" strike out the following: "and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 11, page 55, the figures "$10,000,000."
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 11, page 55, strike out the figures "$10,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter any civilian employee of the Ordnance Department who is a citizen of the United States and employed at any station outside the continental limits of the United States may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, after at least two years' continuous, faithful, and satisfactory service abroad, and subject to the interests of the public service, be granted accrued leave of absence, with pay, for each year of service, and if an employee should elect to postpone the taking of any or all of the leave to which he may be entitled in pursuance hereof such leave may be allowed to accumulate for a period of not exceeding four years, the rate of pay for accrued leave to be the rate obtaining at the time the leave is granted.

Mr. BORLAND. I reserve a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Mr. KAHN. That is a new provision and is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. I will reserve it, but I wanted to ask the purpose of it.

Mr. KAHN. The purpose is this: In the Philippine Islands the men want to accumulate their leaves for a number of years so that they will be able to make a trip to their homes in the United States. At the present time if they take leave every year they have to go to some place in or near the Philippines for their vacation. That is as far as they can go in the 30 days' leave allowed them.

Mr. BORLAND. How many men will be affected by this? Mr. KAHN. I imagine the civilian employees of the Government will be affected. It takes 30 days for the transport to bring them to the United States. These men are only civilian em-ployees of the Ordnance Department. I do not think there are a great many of them, but it seems to me that they should have the right to accumulate their leave so that every three or four years they will be able to have about three months to come to their homes in this country.

Mr. MANN. How much is their annual leave? Mr. KAHN. Thirty days.

Mr. MANN. So that in four years they could come to the United States and go back again?

Mr. DENT. I think it is immaterial how many employees are affected by it. They ought to have this right.

Mr. BUTLER. The same provision was put into the naval bill last year.

Mr. BORLAND. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 55, line 24, after the word "granted," insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used by the Ordnance Department for the purchase of any article from private manufacturers until the Government arsenal or arsenals manufacturing the article it is intended to secure shall be operated at the fullest possible capacity with economy to the Government."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this amendment speaks for itself. There has been some question here as to why our arsenals are not run at their capacity and are not fully manned. We have five great working arsenals in this country, only two of which are fully manned to-day. The other three are short some 1,000 men. The adoption of this amendment is intended to be only a direction to the Ordnance Department to speed up. I do not think there is anything in it that will handicap them in any way. I drew it very carefully. It may be said that they could not go out and buy material, or that they could not secure men at the arsenals. I do not think that is true. The words "if possible" are in there, and if it is not possible to secure labor and materials, then, they can purchase what they need.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we really do get into war this summer.

Does the gentleman think then we ought to be in a position where we can not purchase supplies because for some reason we have not get our example rupping at the fullest capacity.

where we can not purchase supplies because for some reason we have not got our arsenals running at the fullest capacity possible, with an Army in the field wanting supplies?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I presume that if we get into war Congress will be in session. Am I not right?

Mr. MANN. Well, no. We may get into war without Congress being in session, though, of course, we can not declare war without Congress being in session.

Mr. CRAGO. If the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, would it not be necessary for any man dealing with the Government to have an inspector at each Government arsenal to determine whether it was running to its full capacity before he would dare contract with the Government?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly not.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly not.
Mr. CRAGO. Why not?
Mr. HULL of Iowa. If the Ordnance Department make a contract, they are responsible.

Mr. CRAGO. But if there is no law back of the contract by which the contractors could get their pay, where would they be?
Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it provides for running Government arsenals three shifts.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, no.
Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the gentleman believes in an 8-hour day and not a 12-hour day.
Mr. HULL of Iowa. I believe in going one step at a time.
Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's amendment says that there shall be no contract let to private individuals unless the Government arsenals are running to their fullest capacity, and fullest capacity means three shifts.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Working on a double-shift capacity.
Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say anything about that.
There is no limit relating to double-shift capacity.
Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think there is.
Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be reported again, to see how broad it is.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be reported again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 55, line 24, after the word "granted," insert:
"Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used by the Ordnance Department for the purchase of any article from private manufacturers until the Government arsenal or arsenals manufacturing the article it is intended to secure shall be operated at the fullest possible capacity with economy to the Government."

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question that the gentleman would want the men working day and night, all the time, Sundays included, according to the wording of the amendment. The gentleman has no regard whatsoever for Government employees.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That amendment is practically what is in the naval bill now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, practically nothing! It goes far beyond anything in the naval bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be voted down. It certainly is too indefinite and would leave the Government seriously handicapped.

Mr. DOWELL. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee if any provision has been made for the manufacture of these small arms at the arsenals? From statements made upon the floor a short time ago it appeared that we are not manufacturing small arms at Rock Island. Is that true?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I really do not recall about that,
Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. They are manufacturing small arms at the Rock

Mr. DOWELL. Then the statements made here are incor-

Mr. TAVENNER. I can state to the gentleman that, according to the last information I received, the small-arms plant had been closed down, but that they are just starting in to again manufacture small arms there.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The information given on the floor a short time ago was that no small arms had been manufactured at the Rock Island Arsenal; that the appropriations made a year ago had not been used in the Rock Island Arsenal for the purpose of manufacturing small arms.

Mr. TAVENNER. That is true, but they are again start-They had closed down the small-arms plant for a

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly. Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think the gentleman is in error. made the statement that they had not turned out any completed rifles. They are at work and have been at work getting the factories started up. It takes time to do these things.

Mr. DOWELL. This appropriation was made at least last year, and nothing yet has been done, so far as the testimony shows, toward the completion of any small arms. All we have is the promise that something is to be done at the Rock Island Arsenal. It seems to me this committee ought to make some provision for the manufacture of these small arms at Rock Island, and it occurs to me that the Government ought to manufacture these small arms, if they can do it at a less price than they can be manufactured by private companies.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. How many small arms does the gentleman want manufactured?

Mr. DOWELL. I do not know how many are being manufactured except from the statement here, but, as I understand it, they are not being manufactured by the Government plants. Mr. ANTHONY. They are being manufactured by Government plants. Let me say that it takes considerable time to equip a factory to turn out a gun. It will probably take six months or more after the Government starts to equip a factory, and the Rock Island Arsenal has been in process of equipment, for that purpose. Mr. TILSON. And the gentleman realizes there is not a factory in the country that can make the Springfield rifle except the Government arsenal?

as I understand it, since the last bill appropriating the money

Mr. BUTLER. There is a concern in the district which I represent that can turn out 6,000 rifles every day.

Mr. CRAGO. But not of that type.

There are a number of plants all over the coun-Mr. TILSON. try that could turn out an indefinite number if they were equipped with the tools necessary, but none except the Government arsenal is equipped for the manufacture of the Springfield

Mr. BUTLER. This concern is equipped to make 6,000 rifles a day for foreigners at this time.

Mr. TILSON. That may be true; but it will take a year to get that plant ready to make one rifle for the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. My only purpose in asking this question was to ascertain if it was the policy of the committee to have the Government factories manufacture these small arms in preference to the private concerns?

Mr. DENT. That is shown by the appropriation bill itself.
Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I stated earlier in the evening that Gen. Crozier testified before our committee that he intended out of this money to manufacture at Rock Island Arsenal 350 rifles a day, and that he intended to manufacture 700 at Springfield, and intended to manufacture 200,000 this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ammunition for field artillery for the National Guard: For the purpose of manufacturing and procuring reserve ammunition for field artillery for the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, the funds to be immediately available, and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $10,000,000: Provided, That not more than $200,000 of this appropriation may be used to procure gauges, dies, jigs, tools, fixtures, and other special aids and appliances, including specifications and detailed drawings necessary for the manufacture by private manufacturers of field artillery ammunition necessary for the use of the land forces of the United States in time of war, and in the purchase of lots of ammunition to complete the object of this proviso the existing laws prescribing competition in the procurement of supplies by purchase shall not govern in orders not to exceed $50,000 in any one case, $10,000,000.

Provided, That hereafter any civilian employee of the Ordnance Department who is a citizen of the United States and employed at any station outside the continental limits of the United States may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, after at least two years' continuous, faithful, and satisfactory service abroad, and subject to the inferests of the public service, be granted accrued leave of absence, with pay, for each year of service, and if an employee should elect to postpone the taking of any or all of the leave to which he may be entitled in pursuance hereof, such leave may be allowed to accumulate for a period of not exceeding four years, the rate of pay for accrued leave to be the rate obtaining at the time the leave is granted.

Mr. BENNET, Mr. Chairman, Loffer, the following around

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of page 55, insert the following as a new paragraph: That if during the fiscal year 1918, in the opinion of the President, an emergency exists affecting the general welfare of the United States, he may waive the limitations contained in the paragraphs relating respectively to ordinance stores, ammunition, manufacture of arms, ordinance stores and supplies, and ammunition for Field Artillery for the National Guard.

Mr. MANN and Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, the amendment is subject to the point of order, and it is very little to me personally whether we have an extra session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, but, as was brought out here earlier in the evening, under section 120 of the national-defense act and the limitations that are in the bill, if there should be such an emergency occurring during the summer, nothing would be available under these three particular appropriations in this bill except the percentages permitted in the bill. Now, I agree

Mr. STAFFORD. How does the gentleman arrive at that conclusion? On reading section 120, there does not seem to be any limitation whatsoever as to the authority of the President, except he is limited in time of war or when war is imminent. There is no limitation of the amount of appropriimminent.

ations carried in the appropriation bill.

Mr. BENNET. Because that is merely an authorization, and money could not be used without express authority of Congress, and the only appropriation there will be at that time will be this bill, and this bill limits these particular paragraphs in the percentages named. Now I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] in what he said a few moments ago that we ought not in time of "imminence," to use the language of the national-defense act, or war rigidly to tie the hands of the President or of the Secretary of War. I call the attention of the committee, and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs especially, to the fact that in the fortifications bill of this year, which became a law on the 14th of February, 1917, in section 5, which is a limiting section, it carries this proviso:

Provided, That whenever, in the opinion of the President, the situation is such as to justify such action he may waive the limitations contained in this section.

With the necessary changes, the amendment I have offered is precisely the same amendment there is in the fortifications bill. It has a dual purpose. It enables the President to act quickly, if he has to act quickly, which I hope he will not have to do, and in the second place, it enables him to act after the 1st of July without calling a special session of Congress. That is the whole intent of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BENNET. Certainly. Mr. MANN. I will confess I do not understand the proposi-I understand what the gentleman is proposing-to take off these limitations-but I do not understand what the limitations are that he wishes to remove.

Mr. BENNET. I will tell the gentleman what they are, and I might say this amendment really was proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] during some remarks I made. Here are the provisos. On page 50, under the heading Ordnance stores, ammunition":

Provided, That not more than one-third of this sum shall be expended in the purchase of the articles provided in this appropriation.

Now, on page 51, line 4-

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman's proposition was limited to the National Guard?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, no; there are three things, "ordnance stores, ammunition," "manufacture of arms," "ordnance stores and supplies.'

Mr. MANN. Let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment without objection.

Mr. MANN. If it is in the gentleman's own handwriting I do not suppose it was reported before.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is for the National Guard.
Mr. BENNET. There are three different headings.
Mr. MANN. That is the way it reads, so-and-so and so-andso "for the National Guard."

Mr. BENNET. No; what misleads the gentleman is this, if he will give me his attention.

Mr. MANN. I am listening to the gentleman; I do not have to look at the gentleman to listen.

Mr. BENNET. The last heading of the paragraph that is quoted there is, "Ammunition for field artillery for the National Guard."

There are these headings: "Ordnance stores, ammunition," that is one; "Manufacture of arms," that is the second one; "Ordnance stores and supplies," that is the third one; "Ammunition for Field Artillery for the National Guard," that is the fourth one. I only put "National Guard" in the last clause. That is where it belongs.

Mr. GALLIVAN. That is clear enough.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman says that is what it is.

Mr. GARDNER. I suggest that the gentleman put quotation marks around each of those subheads.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be so amended that if it be adopted quotation marks may inclose each of the subheads.

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. DENT. My objection to that is, Mr. Chairman, the President might do that anyway.

Mr. BENNET. I take the language of the national-defense act, section 120.

Mr. DENT. I thought the national-defense act read "that the President in time of war or imminence of war." The language used in the national-defense act refers to when we are confronted with war or similar emergency, in which the public safety is threatened.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me, we have the text at hand. Section 120 is the one the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] refers to, and it reads:

The President in time of war or when war is imminent.

Mr. BENNET. I am very frank to say that the authorship is partly mine and partly that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner], but most largely his.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to it if it follows the language of the national-defense act.

Mr. GORDON. If it does, it is unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] withdrew his reservation or make the point of order?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to any portion of it being stricken out and the language of the nationaldefense act inserted literally.

Mr. MANN. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] to this situation. I do not remember what the national-defense act says, but I was under the impression that it said in case of war or imminence of war.

Mr. DENT. When war is imminent.
Mr. MANN. That is the same thing. We waived that by passage of a resolution in reference to the Mexican situation, because we did not want to say that war was imminent. We may have the same situation this summer where an emergency exists, but we do not want to declare that war is imminent; though I think it is a wise proposition.

Mr. DENT. As it reads now—
Mr. MANN. In case of national emergency, I think that is the way it reads.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; in case of national emergency.

Mr. MANN. And the President, unless the situation might arise, could not afford very well to declare that war was immi-

Mr. BENNET. Come to think about it, that is the language used in the naval bill.

Mr. MANN. I am with him to keep out of the war if possible. This is the thing we did on the border when Mr. Hay put his resolution through.

Mr. DENT. If we use the word "emergency" simply for him to determine when the emergency arises, then we might as well have the provision.

Mr. MANN. I think the President will be careful about it. Mr. DENT. The word "emergency" is such a broad word it might cover any situation.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it leaves it absolutely with the President to determine.

Mr. FIELDS. With this provision in here I think it is all

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bennet].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

Arming, equipping, and training the National Guard: To provide for the procurement of forage, bedding, shoeing, veterinary service and supplies for horses and pack mules that may be owned, acquired by, or issued to organizations of the National Guard, $750,000.

Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to transfer to those organizations of the National Guard entitled thereto under the provisions of this act such number of horses and pack mules purchased by the Quartermaster Corps of the Army under the provisions of the act of July 1, 1916, not required for the proper equipment of organizations of the Regular Army, that can be issued to National Guard organizations under the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War as set forth herein, all expenses incident to such transfer to be met from appropriations made for and on behalf of the National Guard; pack mules so transferred may be issued not to exceed six to any one machinegun troop or company, or four to any one ambulance company, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Mr. GREEN of Lowe. Mr. Choirmen, I. move to strike out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do that for the purpose of enlivening the proceedings of the evening by having read an editorial from the Des Moines Register and Leader, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AN ENGINEER HIKE.

While the high officers of the Regular Army are scouting about for material to discredit the National Guard they might seize upon a little incident which occurred while the Iowa engineers were taking a six-day hike from Brownville with a company from the Engineering Corps of the Regular Army.

The guardsmen set the pace. It was recognized that they could not stand such a daily jaunt as the regular engineers would undergo, so the day's march was adjusted to the limitations of the boys from Iowa City.

At the end of the second day the Regulars were footsore and fagged while the guardsmen were playing leapfrog. On the third day the seasoned veterans of the Regular Army got up early, emptied their service rolls and each one put about 50 pounds of his marching load into a wagon, then stuffed his roll with straw and was ready for the march.

The veterans stood the third day magnificently, but when camp was

The veterans stood the third day magnificently, but when camp was pitched in the evening the officers discovered the trick and the Regulars were sent back to the starting place of the day's march and compelled to hoof it again over every mile of ground on the following day, fully Indened.

This information could be placed before Congress with telling effect. In the eyes of Gen. Scott it would prove the following facts:

The Regular Army is more resourceful than the National Guard.
The officers of the Regular Army are very keen eyed.

Splendid discipline exists in the Regular Army, as evidenced by the willingness of the Regulars to beat twice over the same path.

The Regulars are highly intelligent, as demonstrated by their comparative study of the specific gravity of straw and tent stakes.

This matter is hereby respectfully referred to Gen. Scott. We believe he will recognize in it a stronger argument against the guard than any he has yet presented to Congress.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, on line 6, of page 56, I move to strike out the figures "$750,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,000,000."

Now, the fact has developed that the animals already issued to the National Guard organizations will require this amount of forage to keep them. That is an exact calculation made by the Bureau of Militia Affairs. We have to provide forage for these animals anyhow, whether they are in the hands of the organizations or they go back to the Regular Army, so that, in view of that fact, I have taken the liberty to offer this amendment.

Mr. DENT. As I recall the testimony taken before the committee, the Militia Bureau did not know at that time how many animals the guard did actually have.

Mr. CRAGO. That is correct.

Mr. DENT. Since that time they have ascertained that they have that number. Therefore I accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Crago: Page 56, line 6, strike out the figures "$750,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Crago].

The amendment was agreed to. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for the participation of the whole or any part of the National Guard in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field and coast defense instruction, either independently or in conjunction with any part of the Regular Army, and there may be set aside from the funds apportioned for that purpose and allotted to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia such portion of said funds as may be necessary for the payment, subsistence, transportation, and other proper expenses of such portion of the National Guard of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia as shall participate in such encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field and coast defense instruction; and the officers and enlisted men of such National Guard while so engaged shall be entitled to the same pay, subsistence, and transportation as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades of the Regular Army are or hereafter may be entitled to by law. To provide for camps of instruction for the instruction of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard. Such camps shall be conducted by officers of the Regular Army detailed by the Secretary of War for the purpose, and may be located either within or without the State, Territory, or District of Columbia to which the members of the National Guard designated to attend said camps shall belong. Officers and enlisted men aftending such camps shall be entitled to pay and transportation and enlisted men to subsistence in addition at the same rates as for encampments or maneuvers for field and coast defense instruction, $1,000,000.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following proviso, after the figures "$1,000,000," in line 9, on page 58.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That the sum appropriated by section 1661. Revised Statutes, for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia, the sum of $14,409,98, proportioned to the State of Georgia for the years 1915 and 1916, be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available for the purpose of paying the expenses incurred by said State over and above the allotments made by the Secretary of War to the State of Georgia from all appropriations therefor in connection with the general encampment held at Augusta, Ga., July 22 to 31, 1914; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and instructed to pay over said amount to the governor of said State of Georgia for said purpose."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I know what this is, and I have no objection whatever to it. It is the same as the bill that was passed at the last session by both bodies, but which did not get to the President.

Mr. DENT. That is a fact.

Mr. MANN. But the Senate passed a bill the other day in relation to the same situation in Oklahoma-a bill just reported, and on the Private Calendar. I will ask the gentleman if he will not let this go over so that in the morning he can look at this other proposition and see if it ought not to be added.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection. Mr. MANN. It was a simple proposition in behalf of some one who did something in connection with the encampment in Oklahoma, some contractor, and they think it ought to be paid, but the appropriation for that year is exhausted.

Mr. DENT. I will ask, Mr. Chariman, that that amendment be passed over, Mr. MANN. Temporarily passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment: Page 58, line 9, strike out the figures "$1,000,000" and insert the figures "$6,200,000."

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to move an amendment to that amendment by inserting in lieu of the "$6,200,000" the

" $4,000,000." figures

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, line 9, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$6,200,000." The CHAIRMAN. To this amendment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Crago] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Crago: Amend the amendment by striking out "$6,200,000" and inserting "$4,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull] has the floor.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] that these amendments had better go over until morning. Mr. DENT. I would like to reach an agreement as to the time for debate.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman can do that to-night.

We agreed to quit at 10 o'clock.

Mr. DENT. That is right. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783) and had come to no resolution thereon.

RELIEF OF THE RUTHENIANS.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimus consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 350, requesting the President of the United States to designate and appoint a day on which funds may be raised for the relief of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians)

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we agreed that there should be no other business transacted to-night except the Army bill. I told many Members that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection at all to the resolution-The SPEAKER. Certainly, the gentleman has objection to the present consideration of it.

Mr. MANN. When we make an agreement we ought to keep it. The SPEAKER. Of course.
Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman from Illinois withhold his objection

Mr. MANN. I have no objection whatever to the resolu-tion when it comes up, but many Members asked me to-day if the House would do any other business to-night except to proceed with the consideration of the Army bill, and I told everybody that It would not.

Mr. HAMILL. Then I withdraw the resolution.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD on the subject of pensions for members of the Coast Guard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TAVENNER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Tavenner] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow Thursday, February 22, 1917, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 22, 1917.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, February 20, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 10.30 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I understand that this morning there is to be read the Farewell Address of Washington. It seems to me that on such an occasion Senators could afford to be in their seats, and I suggest the absence of a quorum. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead Hollis Simmons Nelson Norris Page Penrose Pittman Poindexter Ransdell Robinson Shafroth Shennard Brady Brandegee Jones Smith, Ga. Smith, Mich. Kenvon Brandegee Bryan Chamberlain Chilton Clapp Curtis Kenyon Kirby La Follette Lane Lea, Tenn. Lippitt McCumber Martin Va Smoot Stone Thomas Townsend Vardaman Dillingham Fernald Martin, Va. Martine, N. J. Sheppard Sherman Works Fletcher

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. James] is absent on official business.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence on official business, upon committees of the Senate, of the Senator from Texas [Mr. Culberson], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman], the Senator from New York [Mr. O'Gorman], the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Clark], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger]. He is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr.

O'GORMAN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. Johnson of South Dakota, Mr. Myers, Mr. Watson, and Mr. Williams answered to their names when called.

Mr. Lodge, Mr. Gronna, and Mr. Sterling entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Under the standing order of the Senate to the effect that after the reading of the Journal on the 22d day of February the Farewell Address of George Washington shall be read, the Chair construes that, in view of the recess, now is the time for the reading of the address.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, there is no morning business. Is that the understanding?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no morning business, because the Senate took a recess.

Mr. PENROSE. I have an amendment to the oleomargarine amendment that I should like to present in order that it may be printed. I ask that it may lie on the table.

printed. I ask that it may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Farewell Address of George Washington will now be read by the Senator from California, Mr. Works.

Mr. WORKS read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you, but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to ism does not forbid it. In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging-in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism-the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guarantee of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States under the auspices of liberty may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene patriotism does not forbid it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here, every which apply more immediately to your interest. Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the Union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common Government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfortand what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indisoluble community of interest as one Nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater se curity from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter. Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations-northern and southern-Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculeted than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This gov-crnment, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government. All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combina-

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the Nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as curs, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind—which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight—the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded fealousies and false alarms, kindles the animosity of one part against another, foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates, but let there be no change by usurpation, for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar struc-ture, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disburse-ments to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object-which is always a choice of difficulties-ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak, toward a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens), the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation: when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim not less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things, diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations; but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended partiotism, this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my procla-mation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sactioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and hu-manity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, hu-manly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be acts:

consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and

Go: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 17th September, 1796.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

S. 7601. An act for the relief of Caleb T. Holland; and

S. J. Res. 201. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to designate and appoint a day on which funds may be raised for the relief of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians).

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20755) to provide a temporary government for the West India Islands acquired by the United States from Denmark by the convention entered into between said countries on the 4th day of August, 1916, and ratified by the Senate of the United States on the 7th day of September, 1916, and for other purposes; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Flood, Mr. HARRI-SON of Mississippi, and Mr. Cooper of Wisconsin managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House concurs in the amendments of the Senate numbered 19 and 34 to the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, concurs in the amendments of the Senate numbered 15, 32, and 33, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; disagrees to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. Moon, Mr. Bell, Mr. Cox, Mr. Steenerson, and Mr. Madden managers at the conference on the part of the House.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that two additional conferees on the part of the Senate be added to the conference committee on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19410) and that the Chair appoint them.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. BRYAN and Mr. WEEKS additional conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE MILITARY ACADEMY (S. DOC. NO. 715).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy relative to additions to the Military Academy to accommodate the increased number of cadets, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, requesting that a compila-tion by the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the legislation affecting insular and other noncontiguous territory of the United States enacted since March 4, 1897, be printed as a document, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE COAST GUARD (S. DOC. NO. 716).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, calling attention to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury for an appropriation of $250,000 to enable the Coast Guard to develop its telephone system of coastal communications, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 21, 1917, approved and signed the following S. 7872. An act to confirm and ratify the sale of the Federal building site at Honolulu, Territory of Hawall, and for other purposes: and

S. $105. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Conway County Bridge District to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Arkansas River, in the State of Arkansas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the following enrolled bills, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

S. 1792. An act for the relief of settlers on unsurveyed railroad lands;

S. 5450. An act to provide for an additional judge in the State of Texas;

S. 5612. An act providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.;

S. 6654. An act to validate a patent to certain lands heretofore issued to the State of Florida, to allow the said State to claim certain other lands, and for other purposes;

S. 7644. An act to create a new division of the northern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Wichita Falls, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other

S. 5716. An act to establish the Mount McKinley National Park, in the Territory of Alaska; and

S. 8044. An act providing for the extension of time for the reclamation of certain lands in the State of Oregon under the Carey Act.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram transmitting a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, pledging support to the Government. The telegram will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The telegram is as follows:

[Telegram.]

Madison, Wis., February 20, 1917.

Hon. Thomas Marshall,
President United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

By joint resolution adopted by the Wisconsin Legislature we are instructed to wire you that the people of Wisconsin have faith that the Government will do all things possible and consistent with the dignity of our Nation to prevent war and that the people of Wisconsin have implicit confidence in our Government and will loyally support the Government in whatever action it may ultimately be necessary to take in the present international crisis.

LAWRENCE C. WHITTET.

LAWRENCE C. WHITTET, Speaker Wisconsin Assembly. EDWARD D. DITTHMAE, President Wisconsin Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Worcester, Milford, Rockland, Cambridge, and Mendon, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Farmers' Club, of Ukiah, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the development and improvement of the national parks, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

UNLAWFUL RESTRAINTS AND MONOPOLIES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to report from the Committee on the Judiciary a joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read for information, Mr. President. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 206) as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the effective date on and after which the provisions of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, shall become and be effective is hereby deferred and extended to January 8, 1918.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this joint resolution extends until January 8, 1918, the time when this law shall take effect, in order that the Newlands Commission, which has been appointed by a joint resolution of Congress to consider this question, may consider it. The Judiciary Committee feel that this law ought to be amended in some respects, but they can not consider it now, so they propose to extend this date until the 8th of January, 1918, in order that Congress may consider it. In the meantime the Newlands Commission will consider this very question, as to what amendments may be necessary,

Mr. SMOOT. Does the joint resolution carry any appropriation?

Mr. OVERMAN. None at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 8297) for the relief of Alfred B. Andrews; to the Committee on Claims,

By Mr. DU PONT:

A bill (S. 8298) to provide that noncommissioned officers and enlisted men of the United States Army on the retired list who had creditable Civil War service shall receive the rank or rating and the pay of the next higher enlisted grade; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 8299) for a public building at Mission, Tex.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 8300) to authorize the change of the name of the steamer Fred G. Hartwell to Harry W. Croft; and A bill (S. 8301) to authorize the change of the name of the steamer Harry A. Berwind to Harvey H. Brown; to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for educational purposes in Alaska from $200,000 to $215.000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 20967), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $300,000 for the purchase of land adjoining the military reservation at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., for the use of an Army post, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to increase the limit of cost of the public building heretofore provided for at Juneau, Alaska, to $500,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 20967), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted nine amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extension of fortifications, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be

NAVY YEARBOOK.

Mr. SWANSON (for Mr. TILLMAN) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 370), which was referred to the Committee

Resolved, That there be printed 200 additional copies of Senate Document No. 555, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "Navy Yearbook," for the use of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19300) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the

Mr. HUGHES. I ask that the conference report lie over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, under ordinary circumstances I should not take the time of the Senate to discuss this bill, for I presume that the action taken by the majority in their caucus is to be carried out on the floor, and that, in a sense, it may be a waste of effort; but I have proposed a substitute for the bill, which I think is so preferable from the standpoint of the taxpayer that I do not only want to explain why I am opposed to the pending legislation, but I wish also to state my reasons for suggesting what I consider to be a better method of procedure.

Mr. President, this is a period of preparedness—military preparedness. We have appropriated, are appropriating this year, and will continue to appropriate large sums of money for this purpose. In order to raise the necessary revenue to pay for these unusual expenditures, unusual methods must be adopted; and the majority party, very largely at least, must be responsible for those methods. In the pending bill we find the possibility of raising revenue, but it is done at the expense of efficiency, of fairness, and is almost entirely a sectional measure.

This is the last period in any bisteries in the last period in any bisteries.

This is the last period in our history when we should undertake any course which is going to penalize efficiency. The reports from Europe are unanimous that there has been an enormous increase in the industrial efficiency of those countries. Of course, it is impossible to determine this accurately, but we have evidence as to what is being done in Great Britain and in some other sections of Europe. The substance of this evidence is that the increase in efficiency in Great Britain, for instance, has been 60 per cent since the beginning of the war, notwithstanding the fact that men have practically been eliminated from manufacturing establishments and their places taken by old men, boys, and women.

If an examination of the industrial conditions of Europe had not been made, we might have reached the conclusion-due partially to the fact that our exports are tremendous-that the manufacturing industries of Europe were much more seriously crippled than they are. As a matter of fact, there has not been any invasion of Great Britain. Her industries are intact; in fact, have greatly increased in volume of production since the beginning of the war. There has been no enemy on German soil. Therefore, the same thing is undoubtedly true of Germany. Practically speaking, this is the situation in every manufacturing European country, with the exception of northern France, Belgium, and a very small area in Italy and Austria, and even in these invaded countries the greater part of their manufacturing interests are intact and have increased in efficiency and capacity. Although these nations are our important customers, they have always been our rivals and are going to be far more serious rivals in the future than they have been in the past.

In order to demonstrate the correctness of the statement I have made as to the increased manufacturing capacity of other countries, I want to bring these facts to the attention of the Senate:

England has produced and sold to the world during the 12 months of 1916 goods to the value of $2,465,107,140 as compared with $2,096,100,617 in 1914, a gain of $369,000,000. Of this enormous production and shipment, manufactured articles comprise practically two-thirds of the total.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to insert herewith a table showing the export from Great Britain in 1914 and in 1916 of articles wholly or partly manufactured.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Wholly or mainly manufactured-Gain in 1916 over 1914, $267,835,332.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it will be seen that the gain in 1916 over 1914 in these manufactured products is nearly $268,000,000 and includes most of the staple products, especially many of those articles in which Great Britain is in active competition with this country. For example, it shows an increase of $74,000,000 in cotton fabrics, $75,000,000 in woolen fabrics, $11,000,000 in wearing apparel, $40,000,000 in chemicals, and $73,000,000 in iron and steel and manufactures thereof.

Of course, it is fair to state that the difference in the prices of these goods at the manufacturer's door partially makes up for the increase; and comparing the British foreign trade of 1916 with 1915, which shows a gain of £218,000,000, and reducing the cost to the 1915 price shows that in many articles the volume of production has not materially increased. Substantially speaking, however, production in England is now at its highest level, notwithstanding the handicap under which that country has been laboring in fitting itself for its military

To illustrate the kind of competition we are likely to meet in the future, let us take another country. During the first 11 months of 1916 Japan exported $500,000,000 of her products and imported $350,000,000, showing a trade balance of practically $150,000,000. During this period exports of cotton yarns and fabrics showed an increase from $50,000,000 in 1915 to $71,000,000 in 1916. Matches increased two and a half million dollars; copper, eight millions; and there were very large increases in the Japanese exports of hosiery, much of it finding a place in the American market. In 1916, during these 11 months, Japan sent to the United States goods to the value of $164,822,000 as compared with $97,080,000 the year before, an increase of $67,000,000, or something like 70 per cent.

That, Mr. President, it seems to me, is a fair indication of the kind of competition we will receive from a nation which is expanding tremendously, which is producing at very much less cost than we can produce, and which is going to be an important rival of our industries in the future.

Since the beginning of the European war we have demonstrated how easy it is to transfer American industrial establishments intended for manufacturing commercial products into plants for the manufacture of war munitions. The same development has taken place in all European countries and at the termination of hostilities these war industries will be transferred to peace purposes with equal facility. This, in fact, is the great question which Congress should be considering at this time, and it is especially important that Congress give serious consideration to this question when passing legislation to raise revenue. Instead of wasting time and energy in enacting makeshift legislation of a most haphazard character intended to tide the Government over until another year, it should be working out a definite financial scheme to fit this country to cope with the commercial activities which will occur immediately hostilities cease.

Protectionists—and protectionists include a great majority of the people of this country, I believe-would prepare through the adoption of a protective tariff to meet this emergency. Even if it were not paramount for us to follow such a course, what folly it is for us to adopt such an untried policy and one which is going to be a tax on efficiency and necessitate enormous proportional expenditures in collecting the revenue required. What we should be doing is studying every phase of the European situation and determining the character of the protective policy we should adopt. There must be a restoration of many of the tariff rates which obtained in the past if we are going to have reasonable protection. Those rates must be determined somewhat by the conditions developing as a result of the European conflict and by the character of the commercial conflict which is to follow. No time should be lost in beginning a study of these problems.

We need not only to develop our efficiency and provide reasonable protection to enable us to meet the competition of our foreign commercial rivals at the end of the war, but we must prepare ourselves to face new conditions when this great European struggle is over. For example, we have several millions of men in the United States engaged in the manufacture of munitions. The minute the war is over their employment will cease and they will come into competition with the other workmen in the United States. It is probable that more than 30,000,000-possibly 40,000,000-of men are in the armies of the European countries at wer or engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war. They have been taken from their normal pursuits. As soon as the war is over they will return to their employments; they will find their places occupied to some degree by a new element in industrial life, and this element will materially increase the competition for employment which will exist in those countries. As a result of this competition during the readjustment period, it is almost certain that the average wage paid in European countries will be even lower than before the war.

Exactly the opposite condition obtains in the United States. Wages are abnormally high. A reduction in wage and adjustment to new conditions always means that some interest is pinched and that many difficulties must be met during the readjustment period. Moreover, European countries are going to be poor. Poverty does not promote the purchase of products. You can only sell to those who have money to buy; and we should not for a moment be deceived by the specious story that European nations are going to need many of our products to rehabilitate themselves because of the destruction which has taken place. As I have suggested, this destruction has been confined to a very limited area. It will take a long time to replace it, but the replacement is going to be carried on by the people at home. In any event, they will not have the rendy money to rehabilitate themselves immediately, and I predict that the purchasing power of Europe will be found to be materially lower than it was before the war.

We are going to find ourselves the great rich Nation of the world. We are going to be able to buy the products of others; they can not buy ours, and unless we erect an artificial barrier to protect our interests we are going to face enormous importations of goods.

Then there is another phase of this question which we must not overlook. Whatever the final action taken may be, it is beyond question that the countries of Europe are seriously considering trade alliances which will make scraps of paper of our commercial treaties and will place a further handicap on our export trade to them. Last year there was held in Paris what was known as the Paris Economic Conference. At this conference a scheme was proposed, seriously discussed, and reported to the allied nations which, in effect, substantially meant free trade between the allied countries, a rate of duty of considerable magnitude between the allies and countries which are now neutral, and a higher rate of duty imposed against the central powers. It has been reported that a similar arrangement was being considered by the central powers.

Moreover, the Scandinavian countries, including Holland and Denmark, have recently had a conference to consider this general question, and especially a proposal to protect the interests of the neutral powers after the war. It is worth noting that the United States was not invited to take part in the Paris Economic Conference. It was, however, invited to join the conference of the neutral powers. Whatever may be the final outcome of these proposed trade alliances, trade conditions after the war are going to differ from those of the past.

Our greatest export market has been in Great Britain. has substantially been a free-trade market. There is no doubt about the adoption of a protective policy by Great Britain, to some degree at least, and this fact is demonstrated by instances rather than settled action. Not long ago the trade-unions of Great Britain in an annual convention or conference of first importance voted practically unanimously in favor of the adoption of a protective policy, and that represents the sentiment of substantially two and a half millions trade-union laborers. There is also a very large element in Parliament favorable to

The point I wish to particularly emphasize is that we are going to face unusual conditions after the war; the solution of the problems arising at that time will require the wisest statesmanship, and we should now be preparing ourselves to meet them. Notwithstanding these probabilities—almost certainties— no action has been taken by the Democratic Party to indicate that it has given the subject the slightest consideration. No tax levied or law proposed since the beginning of the European war would lead to the conclusion that those who compose the majority have any thought for this phase of the future.

On the other hand, just before the war a law was enacted lowering the tariff to one-half the average rate imposed under the lowest tariff law we have ever had on our statute books, and under which nearly 70 per cent of our imports come in free. Few people stop to consider that we are enjoying at this time in the war the benefits of a protection as important in its operation as any law we have ever passed. We are unable to obtain any importations from the central powers, or material importations from many other countries, and yet we are importing a larger volume of goods than ever before. People should not be deceived in the slightest degree by our large foreign trade, for the most cursory investigation shows that this trade is incident to the war and originates in those sections producing war mate-Of course these exports are not entirely confined to war materials; they include very many fabrics and articles used during war and for which there will be no demand when the war is over. Without going into detail, it is difficult to comprehend the enormous supplies of such articles as woolen blankets, material for uniforms, shoes, cotton fabrics, and incidentally almost every kind of manufacture in which our people are engaged which go to make up the immense volume of exports we are now shipping abroad and which will cease when the war

On September 4, 1914, the President called the attention of Congress to the fact that the customs receipts for the month of August were ten millions less than the month of August, 1913, saying that the loss was almost entirely due to the war in Europe and not to a change in our tariff law. Customs receipts for August, 1914, were about $19,000,000. In August, 1913, under Republican tariff law they had exceeded $30,000,000. falling off in revenues commenced earlier in the year of 1914. In February, for example, the customs receipts were about $17,000,000, or $2,000,000 less than the month of August. For the eight months prior to the war customs receipts averaged $22,200,000 a month, while for the corresponding months in 1913 they averaged $30,934,000, or a difference of $8,700,000 a month. It is not denied that this falling off in customs receipts was due to the decrease in rates of duty and not to a lessening in the importations.

During the calendar year ending December 31, 1916, our imports aggregated $2,391,716,000. If the rates of duty which obtained under the Payne-Aldrich law had been in operation in 1916—during the life of that law the average ad valorem duty was 19½ per cent—there would have been added to the Treasury through customs receipts $467,940,000 since the Underwood-Simmons law took effect, which would have practically paid for the extraordinary expenditures which have been made up to this time.

At this time if we would enact a reasonable protective-tariff law and issue bonds to provide for our military preparations we could repeal the war-revenue tax, the income tax, the corpora-tion tax, the inheritance tax, and not pass this proposed excess profits tax, and still have sufficient revenue to meet the actual needs of Government, imposing such taxes as those to which I have just referred in time of unusual need and reserve them for that purpose. In the meantime we should leave to the States these means untrammeled in providing for their own revenue; in other words, if you ask how the Republican Party would provide for this situation we would reply, We would impose a suitably protective tariff law and provide for unusual demands on the Government through a bond issue, with stringent provisions for its elimination within a reasonable period of time.

This brief summary I have given of the probable situation which will confront us at the end of the war, it seems to me, is sufficient to show the desirability and necessity of adopting a permanent and systematic policy of taxation rather than levying special direct taxes.

There can be no difference of opinion as to the necessity of additional legislation to finance the Government. Notwithstanding the imposition of corporation taxes, income taxes, inheritance taxes, and war-revenue taxes, we find the ready resources of the Government at a lower ebb than they have ever been since the Civil War; in fact, if the condition of the Treasury were fully appreciated and we were not in the midst of a period of business activity in many lines which has been reflected in most directions, it would produce a financial panic. This is due to ineffective tariff legislation, unusual appropriations for military purposes, and an accumulation of harebrained schemes which the majority party have foisted on the country.

Recent discussions in the Senate, even those of yesterday, illustrate the condition in which we find ourselves. It is regrettable to have to say that there seems to be no concerted action to promote reasonable economy or conserve the best interests of our people, and I want to demonstrate to the Senate the deplorable condition of the Treasury.

The daily Treasury statement of Saturday, February 17, 1917, shows a working balance in the general fund of $70,736,613.82. There has been deposited to that date in this fund the sum of $48,128,727 for the retirement of outstanding national bank and Federal reserve bank notes that have been assumed by the United States. If that sum be deducted the amount remaining is $22,607,886.58. The sum of $66,485,461.85 has been placed to the credit of disbursing officers and was subject to their checks to the full amount, so that instead of a general fund in the Treasury of $70,736,613.82 on February 17, 1917, there was in reality a deficit of $43,877,575.27.

It is hard to take the view of the Secretary of the Treasury that this forty-odd millions paid in by banks to take care of retiring circulation, constituting a demand obligation on the general fund, is not a liability but considered as available funds to meet any other general expense. It is especially difficult to become reconciled to this position of the Secretary in this matter, when in his annual report for the year ending June 30, 1916, in his statement of the condition of the general fund, the item of money deposited by banks to retire circulation-aside from the 5 per cent-is neither carried as a liability nor is there anything to show it as being included in the balance of the general fund; but, on the other hand, it is found as an item in the statement of "Public debt."

The Secretary, in referring to the deposits to the credit of disbursing officers, states:

These disbursing officers' balances consist of amounts placed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the credit of disbursing officers, against which they are authorized to draw checks in payment of public obligations. * * * As a matter of fact, money in many instances is not spent for months, and sometimes not at all, being returned to the Secretary's account. * * * Funds are placed to the credit of disbursing officers practically as a bookkeeping arrangement.

The "public obligations" referred to by the Secretary are, of course, already incurred and due, or are maturing, and it would seem unreasonable to take for granted that deposits would be made with disbursing agents without immediate or near demand for such funds to cover these obligations. Should the Secretary for any reason after making these deposits conclude to order balances with disbursing officers remitted to the Treasurybalances with disbursing officers remitted to the Treasury—say, 30, 60, or 90 days after the date of such deposits—the probabilities are strong that such order would be complied with by disbursing officers by filing statements, accompanied with vouchers and other evidence of payments, instead of transferring actual money. It would be true also that the longer disbursing officers withhold statements covering expenditures, the greater would be the fictitious portion of the balance represented by these credits in the general funds apparently available, as shown by published statement.

The condition of the Treasury and the expenditures of the Government are more clearly demonstrated, perhaps, by making comparisons with the past than in any other way. We look comparisons with the past than in any other way. We look back to the Civil War period with the feeling that at the time our armies were the largest in our history, when probably we had a million men in the field, this country had to face enormous expenditures. That is true; and yet, compared with the expenditures of to-day, with the exception of one year, they were almost trivial. I think it fair to say that the appropriations for this year will aggregate as much as $1,750,000,000. I have not the exact figures before me.

I wish to direct your attention to the expenditures during the Civil War period. Exclusive of postal deficiencies, as there were in those years, the total expenditures of the Government in 1861 were $61,000,000; in 1862, $466,000,000; in 1863, $717,000-000; in 1864, $863,000,000; in 1865, $1,294,000,000; and in 1866, $519,000,000. Even in the year 1865, when the expenditures were 50 per cent more than in any other year of the Civil War and provision was being made for at least a million men in the field, we were not spending very much more than two-thirds of the expenditures for the fiscal year.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if that statement includes the bond issues?

Mr. WEEKS. It includes all expenditures made. Of course, it does not mean that money was raised and expended during that time by the selling of securities. At the end of the war we had in the neighborhood of two and a half billion dollars of public debt, which, of course, included more than 50 per cent of the total expenditures during the war.

The highest expenditures made for our Navy, when we were blockading the whole coast of the Confederacy, during any one year was $122,000,000, and yet the naval appropriation bill which is about to be taken up will appropriate in the aggregate $531,000,000-more than four times as much as we spent for naval purposes in any year during the Civil War.

No annual expenditure of the Government before 1890, exclusive of expenditures for postal purposes, exceeded $400,000,000. At that time, you will remember, there was a great cry against the large expenditures of the Government, and Mr. Speaker Reed, when criticized for his leadership of a Congress which had appropriated a billion dollars, or $500,000,000 a year, replied that it was a billion-dollar country. Yet we are appropriating very nearly four times as much as we did 26 years ago.

The expenditures during the Spanish War, when we had a considerable Army in the field and bought a great amount of new material, did not aggregate in any one year one-half the amount we are appropriating this year for general expenses.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX.

The excess profits tax proposed in this bill is unique in the history of taxation. I can not find any record of the imposition of such a tax in time of peace or war. It is a tax upon business; and yet, it does not tax all business, only that conducted by corporations and partnerships. It is not a tax upon the magnitude but essentially upon the economy of operation. It is not a tax on large capital; it may apply with equal force to men of small capital. As its provisions would tax the corporation and partnership differently, it will tend to drive the partnerships into a corporation. As it taxes partnerships or corporations and does not tax the individual conducting the same kind of business, it will have a tendency to prevent the successful individual giving those who have been his employees an opportunity to become interested in the direct profits of the business which their industry and capacity have helped to de-

This provision of the bill seems to imply that the Democratic Party believes 8 per cent is a sufficient profit and that anyone receiving more than 8 per cent should be taxed-no, not exactly taxed, but should have some part of his profit confiscated for the purposes of government. Perhaps if we were entering upon a policy of controlling industrial action, including the rates of returns paid to those furnishing the capital, we might conclude that 8 per cent would be a sufficient average return; but anyone who knows anything about business will testify to the great irregularity resulting in every industry. There are years of plenty and years of almost complete failure. In the years of plenty, the frugal and prudent producer lays aside a part of his earnings for the development of his plant, the improvement of his machinery, or any other purpose which will promote the efficiency of his undertaking, in order to enable him to maintain some payment on the capital invested in years when a return is not earned. It is of vital importance to an industry to be able to pay regular dividends. There to an industry to be able to pay regular dividends. have become a great number of investors in this country who have become a great number of investors in this country who depend partially or wholly on the income they receive. will not put their money into an industry which pays large dividends one year and does not pay any for three or four years, as would be the result if the manager, lacking in prudence, were to pay out all of his earnings one year; but if he does provide for the condition I have described the Government comes along and seizes a part of the money which really belongs to the investors in the enterprise in bad years and applies it to governmental purposes. It is a short-sighted and unfair method of procedure.

If you can take 8 per cent, why not take 10 per cent, or 20 or 30? Is that going to be the policy of the Democratic Party? Are we going to have continued the extravagance of the past three or four years-appropriations for purposes like the Shipping Board, the nitrate plant, the armor-making plant, and other similar schemes which every trained and prudent business man knows should not be made, and then seize by actual confiscation the property of our citizens to supply such facilities and go into competition with them? Is that going to be the policy of the Democratic Party? If so, as soon as it penetrates the public understanding there will be a revulsion of feeling which will destroy the ascendancy of a party inaugurating it.

You have already established an income tax, so unfairly ·levied that it imposes a very large burden on a comparatively in competition with our own States, which have depended on both of these forms of taxation to obtain necessary revenue. In this bill you propose to increase the inheritance tax. are now establishing this excess profits tax. Are you going to increase it if you need more revenue? That is a question of vital importance to the American business man and will determine the kind of business he does and the manner of conducting it. If you are going to establish an 8 per cent limit as a fair profit resulting from the conduct of business, why not insist that any concern earning more than 8 per cent shall contribute to the losses of some other industry not making 8 per cent? Why not provide that no man shall, through his energy and brains, develop a better business than a less efficient competitor? There can be no other result if such a policy as is contained in this bill is adopted. The whole course of this legislation is going to adversely affect American progress, discourage efficiency, and in the long run reduce American wages.

I am going to give a few illustrations of the effect of the application of this proposed law, and I think they will fairly demonstrate the contention I make that the bill is unfair; that it is sectional; that it does not apply with the same force to the wealth of the country as it does to the efficiency of the country; and that from every standpoint it will be vicious in its results.

(1) The bill is objectionable because it is class legislation. The incomes derived from agriculture and from personal service are to be exempt. Thus, a wealthy farmer or a professional man who may be a lawyer receiving large fees escapes altogether.

(2) Although there is a flat exemption of $5,000, there would still be many partnerships or close corporations upon which this tax would be a burden, for in many cases the capital invested may be small, the business having been built up entirely by personal effort.

(3) Capital investment is defined as actual money paid in and actual property owned, together with undivided surplus. To ascertain this would involve great difficulty in some cases and would probably necessitate governmental inspection. The latter be another step toward centralization. In short, the doctrine of "the less government the better" under Democratic rule is being thrown to the winds.

(4) The legislation is punitive in effect. It is leveled at the profits of business, at the effective results of capital and surplus. It is a tax upon the efficiency of the Nation.

(5) In theory an income tax is an ideal one, because the fundamental idea upon which it is founded is that taxation should be imposed according to ability to pay. But there should be as nearly as practicable equality of sacrifice among the taxpayers, and a tax levied at a uniform rate can not produce equality of sacrifice.

The proposed law is in effect an income tax possessing some of the vices and few of the merits which that form of direct tax contains. The only sound income tax is one which reaches everyone in a proportionate degree.

The basis upon which the 8 per cent of excess profits is proposed to be allowed is unfair. That basis is not the present value of the property of a partnership or a corporation, but the value of the property at the time it was transferred to the partpartners 20 years ago and contributed to the partnership $10,000 each, making a total original contribution of $20,000, by the ability and industry of those two partners that business might to-day be worth $1,000,000. They would not be allowed 8 per cent upon the present value of their business or plant of $1,000,000, but only 8 per cent upon the money originally contributed, or on the property at its value when originally transferred to the partnership; in the case I have supposed that would be 8 per cent upon $20,000.

In a word, the excess profits feature of this bill is unfair for the following reasons:

1. It is discriminatory. It is unfair.

3. It will discourage initiative; it will prevent development of resources and industries.

4. It will favor certain classes or groups.

It will cause great confusion in its interpretation.

6. It fixes an arbitrary cash basis of value which, under the capital-stock tax rulings, is unsound and unreasonable.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

A conference of industrial managers of some of the largest and most important enterprises in the United States has recently been established. This conference was originated and meetings held for the purpose of discussing trade relationships and the best and most effective means of developing our efficiency and capacity to successfully compete with the industries few citizens. You have increased the income tax once since the of the world. A short time ago this industrial conference board original law was passed. You have imposed an inheritance tax wrote to the Finance Committee of the Senate making some comments on the bill under consideration, and I wish to put this communication in the Record in its entirety, because it is a calm, dispassionate discussion of this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hughes in the chair).

Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 10, 1917.

To the honorable the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

To the honorable the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The National Industrial Conference Board, composed of 14 national associations of industrial employers who are jointly studying and investigating important questions which have a bearing on industrial development and the conduct of business, to wit: American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, American Paper and Pulp Association, Electrical Manufacturers (Lub, National Paper and Pulp Association of Wood Manufacturers, National Association of Wood Manufacturers, National Boat and Shoe Manufacturers' Association, National Founders' Association, National Metal Errectors' Association, National Founders' Association, National Metal Errectors' Association, National Founders' Association, National Metal Trades Association, National Founders' Association, National Metal Trades Association, National Founders' Association, National Metal Trades Association, Rubber Club of America. Slik Association of America, and United Typothetis and Franklin Clubs of America, begs leave to submit herewith the following observations and criticisms in regard to the excess-profit tax feature of the pending revenue bill, H. R. 20573. The proposed material processity of largely increased national revenues if the Nation is to be placed in condition for national defense. It believes that representatives of national business interests should not and will not object to any fair tax, however heavy, which is necessary for national defense, but it believes it to be a duty not less than a right to object to the impractical, arbitrary, and discriminating form in which the proposed measure is cast. The pending proposal represents a growing tendency to exempt a great mass of citizens who are well able to contribute, from the pecuniary burden of government. When the nations of the world are demanding universal service, our own country ought not to inaugurate a system in which nich represents a growing tendency to the second proposed measure is cast. The pen ing friction.

5. It will constitute a direct and discriminatory tax upon our most valuable national assets—invention, initiative, and energy. The inventor properly looks to a high rate of profit during the life of his patent for his incentive and reward. The pioneer in shipping or foreign trade enterprise or new and untried fields of industry likewise looks to a high return during the period while high risk obtains for his inducement to risk his capital and effort. Unusual energy and ability with a small capital may produce much larger returns than moderate energy and ability with a much larger capital, and so may perform valuable public service. All these valuable public assets—invention, initiative, energy, and ability—are penalized by the proposed tax.

6. It constitutes an unwise and unfair discrimination against good will, which is not included in the bill under the heading of actual capital. Good will is property. It can be bought and sold. A corporation which has built up a valuable good will has added to its surplus property, its invested capital, just as truly as has a corporation with undivided profits employed in the business. To count the undivided profits, but not the good will, as capital, lays an unfair burden upon the good will and also penalizes the elements which enter into and promote good will, such as honesty, integrity, special ability, or service, which public interest requires should be encouraged.

7. Its collection will involve many serious practical difficulties, necessitating extensive and inquisitorial machinery, and lay an unduly large charge upon all corporate enterprises, successful or unsuccessful, in the shape of extra reporting and accounting. The widest variance exists in State corporation laws regarding the different elements involved by the proposed tax. The Federal Trade Commission has said that the great bulk of business in this country is conducted without a proper cost-accounting system, and without proper cost accounting profits can not be ascertained. Multiplicity of reports, increased and probably extensive revision of bookkeeping, complicated and extensive inquisitorial machinery, and wide latitude for inequity, fraud, and evasion are all necessary parts of the actual collection of the proposed tax.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD, FREDERICK P. FISH, Chairman. MAGNUS W. ALEXANDER, Executive Secretary.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. President, I am going to state a few examples which I think will demonstrate some of the criticisms I have made against this legislation. Corporations have been I have made against this legislation. Collection of taxes. Who singled out as a fair prey for the imposition of taxes. Who compose the corporations? Under the present system very largely they are the people themselves. There are more than 100,000 stockholders, for example, in the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and more than 100,000 stockholders in the United States Steel Co. You can no longer say because a corporation is large or important it only represents one or two or a half-dozen interests. It is a means, when large and important enough, through which prudent people trying to save something for their old age may safely invest their savings. It should be our purpose to encourage such organizations if they furnish safe investment facilities for those who generally have not had experience in investing their money with safety, and who are frequently led to put their savings in wild-cat enterprises and lose them.

Combination of the capital of small stockholders is necessary for the promotion and continuance of business on a large and economical scale for the production of the necessaries of life.

In order to make great business enterprises attractive for investors they must be stable and profitable.

The greater the risk, the larger the profit ought to be. The continued addition of new taxes to the burden of corporations is bound and has begun to lessen the value of the investment in industrial enterprises

Twenty years ago investment in railroad stocks was considered most conservative. To-day such investments are invest-ments to be avoided. The trend of legislation, if followed, will bring the same results to industrial corporations.

Incomes of partnerships derived from agriculture or personal services are exempt hereunder. This certainly is not for the protection of the small farmer. It rather encourages combinations of investors to control large agricultural interests.

If such an excess profits tax is to be imposed, why should it not fall upon partnerships controlling large areas and making profits in excess of 8 per cent? There are many such examples.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it interrupt the Senator if I would call his attention to the fact that we have amended the bill so as to include corporations and copartnerships engaged in agriculture?

Mr. WEEKS. No. I regret that I had not noticed that fact, It is very frequently the practice for corporations located in other New England States to maintain offices in Boston. It is almost essential for them to do so in order to maintain their own selling departments. Such a corporation located in Maine would be taxed the local city taxes and the Maine franchise tax, the Massachusetts franchise tax, the city of Boston tax, the Federal income tax, and the Federal capital-stock tax.

Almost exactly that same condition would obtain in other States. Senators forget that we raise a very much greater amount of revenue in all States for local purposes than the proportion of the contribution which those States make for the support of the General Government. We go on levying taxes in Washington as if they were the only taxes imposed against our citizens, when as a matter of fact we are frequently taking from the States the only sources of revenue, or at least the main sources, they have, and are piling up taxation and indebtedness in a way which is going to bring us serious trouble unless we face the situation and stop some of the extravagance. We should adopt the budget system of government.

We can not avoid enormous expenditures in any other way, and it is up to Congress to consider that question without destop this trend of unparalleled expenditures and the imposition of taxes not justified and in competition with the taxes imposed by our own States.

In some of the State franchise taxes and in the case of the Federal taxes the Government exercises supervision of the method of accounting and fixing the values for the purpose of determining the tax to be assessed. This has resulted in great confusion and uncertainty.

The excess profits tax does not fall fairly or equally.

PARTNERSHIPS.

Take two cases: A and B have $50,000 each which they invest in manufacturing raincoats-capital, $100,000. They make $20,000. Under this bill their exemptions would be $5,000 plus 8 per cent of $100,000, or $8,000, a total of $13,000. They would pay a tax of 8 per cent upon the excess $7,000, or $560.

C having $100,000 establishes the same kind of a business next door, makes $20,000, and is not taxed under this bill because he is operating as an individual. The smaller investors, who are obliged to join forces in order to do business, are taxed while the wealthier man pays nothing upon excess profits.

A brokerage concern having a large capital and making large profits would be exempt under the "personal-service" clause,

The success of corporations depends to a great degree upon the personal services of their managers, and there are many instances where a small capital plus valuable personal services yields large returns on the capital invested. These concerns would be unfairly and excessively taxed under this bill. Personal services in a partnership are free from tax. Personal services in a corporation with perhaps less capital involved are

For the purpose of fixing the income tax of corporations certain returns of financial condition are demanded by the Government.

Also under the new capital-stock tax other returns are required.

From these the Government determines the value of the capital stock of corporations. Section 202 of this bill fixes another standard of value upon which excess profits may be determined.

If the Government determines the value under the capitalstock tax for purposes of taxation—and it is presumed that value thus determined is fair—it should accept its own valuation for the purpose of determining what constitutes excess

Government appraisals of value fixed for determining one tax should be accepted as decisive and should not vary in the same year.

Business concerns to-day are hampered by the numerous requirements for returns and by the arbitrary demand of Government officials demanding changes in accounting and differing methods of fixing valuations. Uniformity would tend to economy both in the private and the public service.

Following the same methods of determining value in the capital-stock and excess profits taxes would remedy the discrepancy and discrimination which this bill raises and would allow a consideration of good will-the most valuable asset of many partnerships and corporations.

Take the case of a newspaper with $200,000 originally invested. For 10 years dividends are not paid. As a part of expenses large sums are paid out of earnings in advertising, in increasing circulation, in paying special writers. A strong personality controls the editorial policy. The paper gains a reputation, a circulation, and at the end of 10 years is worth $400,000, a value built on personal service and the foregoing of dividends. Its presses and physical assets for which cash was paid may be worth not more than $150,000, though the total value of the business may be worth two or three times that sum. The money earned and spent for circulation, advertising, special writers, and so forth, has built up a value which the Government taxes under the capital-stock tax, but would decline to consider under this act.

It will thus be seen that the bill operates to exempt personal services i: one case, but refuses to make allowance for them

To show the difference, take the case of a corporation, a partnership, and an individual, each having a capital of $100,000, which makes an annual net profit of $50,000:

Actual capital invested	$100,000
Net profit	50, 000

Total tay	3, 860

In addition each partner in a partnership or each stockholder in a corporation must pay an income tax on all income in excess of $4,000. This income tax was greatly increased last October, and yet an individual conducting that business would only have to pay the income tax which is now a part of the law.

Take the case of a partnership or corporation in which the principal owner has secured a patent on an invention and has from time to time made improvements upon it. In the course of many years it has acquired great value through his personal Comparatively little cash has been paid in. This value is taxed under the income tax and capital-stock tax laws, but no credit is given to it under the proposed bill, because the greater part of its value does not rest upon paragraphs (1), (2), or (3) of the proposed section 202. No allowance for losses in years immediately preceding is made. If it is impracticable to go back beyond one year, why not accept, for the purpose of determining the exemption, the fair average value of capital assets for the preceding year?

Mr. President; there was called to my attention the other day case of a corporation which has not earned and has not paid dividends for seven years, and yet during the past year, having developed a quality and class of goods for which there was great demand, it made 40 per cent on its capital. That is only an average for the eight years of 5 per cent. Five per cent is certainly not an excessive profit for stockholders going into a manufacturing concern; and yet under this bill that corporation and its stockholders are going to be taxed on their proportion of the 40 per cent, which really belongs to them, and which should and would be reserved by any prudent concern to try to continue dividends during a term of years.

The States have depended upon direct corporation taxes for their revenue.

The United States Government is steadily encroaching upon this field with its income, inheritance, and capital-stock taxes.

The logical result of this Government exaction of taxes and control of accounting and valuations will be national incorporaion laws, to which so many States object.

Let me take other examples showing the unfairness and inadequacy of this law.

The Massachusetts franchise tax is about 1.94 per cent of the value of the capital stock less real estate and taxable property, both within and without the State, and the minimum of one-tenth of 1 per cent less local tax.

Now, take the three cases of corporations having, respectively, a capital of $500,000, $1,000,000, and $2,000,000.

Cases.	Capital,	Capital,	Capital,
	$500,000;	$1,000,000;	$2,000,000;
	property	property	property valued at	valued at	valued at
	$300,000.	$300,000.	$300,000.
Property tax (local), about $18 per thousand	$5,400 3,880 2,000 4,800	$5,400 13,510 2,000 1,600	$5,400 32,910 2,000
Tax to profits, per cent. Earnings to capital, per cent.	16,080	22, 510	40, 310
	16.08	22, 51	40, 31
	20	10	5

The above is based on the assumption that the capital stock is worth par. Of course, in the first case with 20 per cent earnings it would be worth more, just as in the third case with 5 per cent earnings it would be worth less.

Now, there are three concerns earning exactly the same amount of money, operating in the same kind of business, having different amounts of capital, and yet all will be taxed differently under this proposed law. That condition applies to New Jersey as well as to Massachusetts.

Taking a New York corporation, making net profits of $100,000, the New York franchise tax is based on the capital stock employed within the State. If dividends of 6 per cent or over are paid, the tax is one-fourth of a mill for each 1 per cent of dividends levied on each dollar of stock. If dividends are less than 6 per cent, or assets do not exceed liabilities, or stock averages to sell below par, then three-fourths of a mill for each dollar of capital. With dividends less than 6 per cent and assets exceed liabilities, or stock averages above par, then 11 mills is the tax.

Taking the corporations to which I have referred in the case of Massachusetts, one having $500,000 capital, another $1,000,000, and the third $2,000,000 capital, and earning profits of $100,000, the results are indicated in the following table:

	Capital $500,000, dividend 7 per cent.	Capital $1,000,000, dividend 5 per cent.	Capital $2,000,000, dividend 2 per cent.
New York State franchise tax Local tax about $17 (property $300,000) Federal income tax Excess profits tax	$2,625 5,100 2,000 4,800	$3,750 5,100 2,000 1,600	$3,000 5,100 2,000
Total	14,525	12,450	10,103

In other words, under this excess profits tax the smaller concern would pay three times as much as the one twice as large, and the concern four times as large would pay no tax at all. You are not getting at the kind of people you think you are going to reach by enacting this legislation. To a great extent the very rich man is going to escape this taxation, but you are taxing the small stockholder in all of these corporations.

One of the features about this that will cause a great deal of difficulty and cause a great deal of unfairness, and has caused a great deal of difficulty and is not remedied in the old income tax, is the question of the valuation of the depreciation that may be allowed.

In the cotton industry in Massachusetts there has been much difficulty in this respect relating to determining valuation. Many corporations, such as cotton mills, some of which have been in operation for nearly a hundred years, under the old method of bookkeeping would carry perhaps a building worth $200,000 or $300,000 on their books at $100,000. Then the question came up as to how, when the income tax came along, they could determine their valuation for the purpose of making their depreciation, and an inspector from the Treasury Department would come along and say they must change their bookkeeping methods.

Another year another inspector would come along and find something wrong in their bookkeeping methods. Several of the New Bedford cotton mills, for example, are now endeavoring to work out with the Treasury Department certain defi-nite forms of valuation; but the difficulty resulting from this question of what is a fair valuation of property can easily be seen. A mill which is in successful operation is worth a great deal of money; but, if it is not profitable or if it is closed down, its real estate is worth substantially nothing. In New England, one of the favorite loans is on real estate; in fact, a considerable portion of savings banks' deposits is loaned on real estate in Massachusetts; but loans are seldom made on manufacturing plants, because their success depends so largely upon the intelligence and ability of the management; and yet in this bill we are giving no credit at all to such intelligence and ability.

Incidentally, to show the scope of this proposed law and the army of people that will be required to enforce it, producing, in my judgment, a cost of collection out of all proportion to the amount of money collected, there are 366,443 corporations making returns to the Internal Revenue Bureau now, of which 190,911 were found to be subject to the income tax. Quite likely they will also be subject to the excess profits tax. Finance Committee of the Senate estimates, I understand, that there will be 50,000 partnerships that will come within the scope of this law. I should think, if the committee's estimate had been 500,000 partnerships they would have been a great deal nearer right. I doubt if even that will represent the number; but if any one can imagine the expense, the time, and the difficulty of examining all these concerns, he will readily understand that the cost of carrying into effect this law is going to be unreasonably large.

Here are more examples to show the unfairness and the unevenness of the application of the law.

Another instance which will show the unfairness of this excess profits tax is that of John Wanamaker, who is conducting an enormous business in Philadelphia and New York as a private individual. He will not be taxed under the provisions of this bill, and yet it is probable that he has one of the most profitable businesses in the United States.

In immediate competition with him are many concerns in every city in the country, the names of which will come readily to the minds of any Senator, and they are partnerships or stock companies, and they will be taxed either as partnerships or as corporations.

Take another more extreme example: A New York broker reported to be close to the administration stated recently to the "leak" committee that he made $476,000 because an English statesman used the word "but" in a recent statement. cent of that $476,000 will be taxed under this proposed law. If the man who profited by his own cleverness in taking advantage of the situation which he foresaw had had a partner, he would have been taxed. No broker operating as an individual will be taxed under this law.

If legislation must be passed along the proposed lines, then I submit that the tax of 8 per cent should be based on net sales and not on capital, as this latter method would be inequitable. Owing to the varying nature of business the capital requisite for a stated volume of sales varies widely. For example, it might require a capital of $100,000 to produce sales of $100,000 in one line, and in another line the same capital might be sufficient to produce a very much larger volume of sales, say, for instance,

With a tax of 8 per cent on capital as proposed the first-named company would be allowed 8 per cent profit on sales before the tax would apply, whereas the latter company would be allowed only 1 per cent profit on sales. Is this fair? This is no fanciful illustration, and I submit that it clearly shows that net sales and not capital is the only fair basis.

The bill bears with particular severity upon partnerships, because the net income of such is arrived at before distributing any remuneration to the partners for their services, whereas corporations are entitled to charge as expense the salaries paid to the general officers. Moreover, the fact that a tax is laid upon an income over 8 per cent on actual cash investment bears heavily upon a partnership as compared with a corporation, because the corporation may have issued stock against intangible assets, such as good will, patents, and so forth, and the age of the corporation may be such that it will not be practicable to determine the actual cash invested in the business except to take book values. In the case of a partnership not having issued stock, no value has been given to the good will or payable assets which they have declared as a result of the growth of its business. Their capital invested will, therefore, stand at the actual amount invested in the business or at the current cash value of tangible assets.

Take, for example, two corporations engaged in cotton and woolen manufacturing. A corporation owns its real estate and machinery and is capitalized at $80,000. B corporation rents its real estate and machinery and is valued at only $50,000, and yet it may be a third or a half larger in its manufacturing capacity. Suppose their profits are equal and that they make $20,000, of which $5,000 is exempt; omitting the corporation tax, their taxes would be as follows:

A corporation, having a taxable profit of $15,000—$6,400, being 8 per cent of capital or actual cash and assets paid in, would have left a taxable amount of $8,600, which, at 8 per cent, would be $688.

B corporation, having a taxable profit of $15,000—$1,200, being 8 per cent of its capital or actual cash and assets paid in, would have left $13,800, which, at 8 per cent, would require $1,104 for taxes.

One of the unfortunate developments connected with this legislation, it seems to me, has been the palpable sectional emphasis given it by those responsible for its promotion. The leader of the majority party in the House of Representatives, who is an old friend, and whom I should hesitate to criticize even if the rules and propriety did not forbid it, in discussing the bill called to the attention of the country a rather unfortunate expression, which emphasizes quite forcibly the attitude of the Democratic Party. He is said to have made this statement:

I think most or the greater part will be levied north of Mason and Dixon's line. All these fellows who live in States that will pay a large part of this tax can get rid of the location argument by removing down to my town of Scotland Neck and pay the tax from there.

I do not know that he made that remark, but such statements, coming from a responsible source, create a feeling which, I contend, is bad for the country.

During the debate in the House it was suggested by those responsible for the legislation in defending the unfair distribution of the taxation imposed that certain of the Northern States should be willing to pay a majority part of the tax because a large portion of the money thus collected would be expended in those States, and Mr. KITCHIN used this language:

Take the Fore River Co. in the city of Boston

that will get more of these appropriations than the entire South and 15 Western States.

That seems on its face a reasonable statement, and yet let us examine it from another viewpoint. The last first-class battle-ship constructed by the Fore River plant was the Nevada. This vessel cost approximately $11,000,000, and required three years and four months to construct. Under the existing corporationtax law the industries of Massachusetts paid an income tax of $2,858,713 during the fiscal year 1916. In three years and four months, the time required to build the Nevada, those industries under the present law will have paid approximately $10.000,000 in income taxes, an amount practically equivalent to the total cost of the Nevada. In other words, the industries of Massachusetts-and if the personal income tax of that State were included the figures would be very much larger-will have paid the National Government in one form of taxes nearly enough to pay the cost of a battleship for the privilege of having it constructed in a Massachusetts shipyard. I think it entirely possible that the State of Massachusetts, if it could be relieved of this tax, would be willing to have the next battleship constructed in Mr. Kirchin's State or any other State which is not bearing a fair share of the burdens of government.

Indeed it is not unreasonable to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that there is no hesitation on the part of States in other sections of the country, and especially in the South, in which section the dominant party now obtains its political power, to spend money collected in the northern part of the country. The slightest investigation—and I will not go into it because I do not believe in making sectional arguments—will demonstrate the fact that the North is paying on every dollar of its wealth five or six times as much as our Southern States and that a much larger percentage of the appropriations made by the Government in proportion to the wealth of the States goes to the sections paying the lesser tax.

As I have stated, the State of Massachusetts paid $2,858,713 in corporation taxes during the fiscal year 1916, an amount which exceeds by a considerable figure the entire tax paid by the nine Southern States of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia. It is estimated by the Democratic leaders that 90 to 95 per cent of the new excess profits tax will be levied upon the Northern States, so that it is entirely probable that the State of Massachusetts, under the proposed law, will pay more toward the proper protection of the country and general rehabilitation of the Federal Treasury than the entire South. The States of New York and Pennsylvania already pay many times more in Democratic direct taxes than the entire South, and under the new law the proportionate difference will be even more marked.

I would not raise this argument, Mr. President, if it had not been made in another House and in public discussions. I simply want to point out the facts as they bear on the case.

The Democratic leader in the House contends that the North should be willing to pay this great proportion of the preparedness expenditures because the demand for protection comes from that locality. But he does not suggest that a sufficient tax should be imposed upon the industries of the States of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona to defray the expenditure of $162,000,000 in protecting those States from incursion by Villa; nor does he suggest that a tax of $11,000,000 should be laid upon the industries of the State in which will be located the armor-making plant; nor that $21,000,000 shall be imposed against the State in which the nitrate plant will be situated. Those expenses are to be met by the issuance of bonds which the administration, no doubt, will expect the North to purchase out of any funds remaining after it has paid all of the other Democratic taxes.

No fair-minded man would contend that it would be fair to impose a tax of $162,000,000 upon the industries of Texas merely because the United States was threatened with attack at that particular point, and yet we have found a great many prominent Democrats ready to champion the theory that the North should be made to pay practically the entire cost of national preparedness because it is from there that the country would most probably be attacked. No foreign enemy will ever declare war against the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania or the State of Massachusetts. Such a declaration, if it should ever come, would be against the entire United States, and no section of the country should be exempt from paying its proper share of the cost of preparedness against such

The four States of New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Illinois pay $30,000,000 of corporation taxes, which is over one-half of the total corporation tax of the country. The same States pay $45,000,000 of individual income taxes, which is about two-thirds of the total income tax, and it is undoubtedly true that the same States will pay a proportional amount of this proposed tax. The net result of this form of taxation is extremely harmful. Only 330,000 people directly pay an income tax, which is less than one-third of 1 per cent of our population, and a comparatively small proportion of the people pay the corporation tax and will pay this excess profits tax directly. As long as one-third of 1 per cent of our population are paying this tax there is nothing to prevent the other 99\(^2\) per cent clamoring for additional appropriations, and the average politician is going to listen with approval to that clamor. If those who insist on following such a course were honest enough to explain to the people that they are not standing their share of this taxation, quite likely this clamor would cease.

In the section of the country which I in part represent there has developed a frugality in saving money, and this has been promoted by the mutual savings bank system, which is one of the prides of Massachusetts and contiguous States. In Massachusetts there are $928,000,000 deposited in savings banks, which represents deposits made by 2,349,207 depositors; in other words, substantially two-thirds as many depositors as there are people in the State. Necessarily there are some duplications among these depositors; that is, a depositor may have accounts in more than one bank—sometimes in several banks—but I think it is fair to assume that from one-third to one-half the people of Massachusetts have deposits in the savings banks. Those banks invest in real estate mortgages and in certain classes of securities, like railroad bonds and other profit-making corporations. In many States the laws surrounding the investment of savings funds are not as stringent as in Massachusetts. The money of some of these banks may be invested in securities directly affected by this 8 per cent excess profits tax. Does anyone think that if these frugal people, who have saved between three and four hundred dollars each, were told they were to be taxed in this imprudent and unfair way in order to maintain the Government, that they would not make a protest? The trouble is that the tax does not fall directly on them, and they do not understand it. Instead of the clamor being against the so-called rich corporation it would be to protect the investments of those who, to a large extent, are the wage earners and savers of money and who by their own efficiency are demonstrating the course the Government should follow.

I ought to add, in the case of the Massachusetts savings banks, that deposits are not taken in amounts larger than $1,000; and when the deposits with accrued interest amount to $1,600 the interest stops, which indicates the comparatively small amounts that can be deposited by any one person.

Mr. President, it should be a fundamental rule in governmental financial operations that all current expenses be paid from the proceeds of the annual tax levy, and that if loans are issued their duration should be within the life of the object for which the appropriation is expended. The expenditures provided for in this bill are very largely of a contrary character to ordinary expenses of government, and it is unfair to the taxpayer of to-day to require him to provide for improvements which are going to be equally beneficial to the taxpayers of future years. Therefore I have provided in the proposed bond issue I have introduced that it shall extend over a period of 20 years, which is quite within the life of most of the objects for which the expenditures are made. wish it to be understood, Mr. President, that I at all approve all of these expenditures. I voted against most of them-the bill to establish a nitrate plant, the shipping bill, and othersbut I assume that money is going to be appropriated to provide for the purposes for which legislation has been adopted, and therefore, if that is to be done, I want it done in this way

The Alaskan Railway, with ordinary annual appropriations for maintenance of way, will be in quite as good condition 20 years from now as to-day. The life of any ship which may be purchased under the existing law will easily be from 20 to 30 years, and ships are now performing good service which are much older than the maximum limit I have suggested. Even battleships are kept on the rolls as first-class ships for a period of about 20 years. Therefore substantially all of the purposes for which we are making provision will be equally material to the people for at least 20 years, which is the life of the bonds I propose.

Having reached that conclusion, another important question is to determine the character of bond. The United States Government has never issued a serial bond. Its bonds issued after the Civil War were intended to be retired by sinking-fund provisions. For many years this policy was carried out by using surplus revenues for that purpose, and as early as 1890 the debt had been reduced from about two and a half billions to substantially a billion dollars. No appropriations for the sinking fund, however, have been made in recent years. I presume one reason for this has been that the estimated revenues were not sufficient to provide for these appropriations. Then another problem has entered into the question in recent years of enough importance to prevent the operations of the sinking fund. I refer to the necessity for bond-secured circulation issued by the national banks.

As time has gone on practically all of our national debt has been used as a basis for circulation and is being used for that purpose to-day. The passage of the Federal Reserve act has removed the necessity for the continuance of issuing that kind of circulation. There is no reason, therefore, in times of ample revenues, provided reasonable economy is used, why the entire national debt should not be paid, and I hope when the present difficulties have been passed that such a course will be consistently followed. It is not an element of strength to a country to have a considerable outstanding indebtedness; it is an element of financial and physical weakness. A country without debt is in much better position to defend itself or wage active hostilities than a country which will be embarrassed by outstanding indebtedness, and in this respect alone the United States will be in a position of great strength as compared with other first-class nations at the end of the present war.

The finances of a municipality, a State, or a nation do not materially differ from those of the private citizen. No private citizen could acquire a good financial reputation if he constantly renewed his indebtedness when it matured. In other words, if the individual or copartnership repeatedly renews indebtedness, it is taken as an indication that they have not sufficient capital to conduct their business operations and their credit is greatly impaired. The sound business concern is the one which borrows temporarily and goes out of debt at some time during its annual operations. The only indebtedness of a relatively permanent character which is justifiable is that required in the large extension of a plant, which might be covered by a mortgage, but that mortgage should be gradually liquidated. Even that kind of indebtedness is an embarrassment to corporations if they wish to go into the market to borrow for temporary purposes. This argument is equally applicable to municipalities, States, or nations, and most local communities in recent years have recognized the necessity of extinguishing indebtedness by establishing sinking-fund provisions, which have generally operated to carry out this purpose; but, as in the case of our National Government, there have been frequent deliberate violations of sinking-fund requirements.

A few instances will illustrate how possible it is to operate sinking funds honestly and yet not obtain the statistical results which seem probable. As late as 1869, in England, a committee of Parliament made an investigation of sinking funds and made a report to this effect; Between 1785 and 1829 England borrowed £330,000,000 at about 5 per cent interest in order to pay the same magnitude of indebtedness at 4½ per cent interest. This policy by which a debt of 4½ per cent was converted into one of 5 per cent meant an annual loss of interest of £1,627,765, extending over a period of 43 years, or a total of nearly $340,-

During our Civil War, the issue of legal-tender notes made under the act of Congress of 1862 was fortified with a sinking fund of 1 per cent. During the war no attempt was made to fulfill this pledge, as the Government was continually borrowing and adding to its total indebtedness.

For many years the State of Massachusetts outranked every State in the Union in the magnitude of its State debt. September 30, 1913, its funded debt was $117,838,412, and its sinking funds at that time were $34,674,498. Incidentally, the very statement of the magnitude of that sinking fund shows the importance of its being well handled and the difficulty of its being entirely invested all of the time. At this time the gross debt of the State, counties, municipalities, and metropolitan district is practically $400,000,000. This debt became so startling that among other phases of it carefully investigated and studied the question of the operation of sinking funds was taken up.
Although it has been optional in Massachusetts since 1882 to issue serial bonds, this study of sinking funds and their operation was sufficient to bring about the passage of an act in 1913 prohibiting sinking funds for municipal loans, making the serial bond compulsory for all such loans and requiring all such indebtedness to be issued on the same basis as had been adopted by the Commonwealth in an act passed in 1906.

In this respect, as in most others, Massachusetts has demonstrated that it is one of the most progressive States. The sinking-fund provision, as far as Massachusetts is concerned, has become a dead letter.

At the constitutional convention in New York year before last this question of a scrial bond issue was given consideration. At that time there was an indebtedness, State and municipal, in New York of something like $2,000,000,000 gross. The constitutional convention unanimously adopted the proposed change in the matter of issuing serial for sinking-fund bonds, and it would have become the basis of procedure in that State if the constitution had not been defeated. I think I should say, however, that during the consideration of this constitution and the arguments relating to it no objection was made to this provision.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

I yield to the Senator. Mr. WEEKS.

I am exceedingly interested in what the Sen-Mr. NORRIS. ator is now stating in regard to the issue of bonds. It may be that in some part of his address he is going to answer the ques-tion I wish to ask. If he is, I hope he will not be diverted by answering it now, but I should like to ask him to give us this information. In a comparison between serial bonds and the other kind, what has been the result in the way they have been sold on the market? I mean, has there been any loss in the sale of serial bonds as compared to other long-time bonds?

Mr. WEEKS. I think I refer to that briefly later on; but I will say now that when serial bonds were first issued there was some prejudice against them because they matured at different periods, and some of them were too short to be considered a good permanent investment. In these days, however, when bonds are required to be deposited for the protection of postal savings banks deposits, when so many banks invest money in short-term bonds and short-time notes, when the Federal re-serve banks could and would buy them, I am told by very many bond men whom I have consulted that a serial bond sells as readily as a sinking-fund bond.

Mr. NORRIS. That is in the case of bonds issued in a series, coming due, let us say, all the way from 1 to 20 years, the shortest-term bond would sell at the same price as the long-term of opinion I have obtained.

Mr. WEEKS. The issue would sell as well as if they all atured at 25 years. That is almost the universal expression matured at 25 years.

Recently the Hon. Charles F. Gettemy, director of the bureau of statistics in Massachusetts, made an investigation involving calculations of some twelve hundred municipal sinking funds. This investigation revealed net apparent deficiencies in 40 cities and towns aggregating $1,794,391.58, and net apparent surpluses in 47 cities and towns aggregating $2,855,192.47. This was followed by the legislation to which I have referred.

Within a year an investigation in New York has demonstrated the fact that the citizens of that Sate have been taxed for sinking funds nearly $19,000,000 in excess of the amount required under a scientific bond-amortization plan. This situation is not due to any one administration, but is the result of the operations of four recent State governments. It was estimated that this accumulation of unnecessary money would have amounted before the maturity of the bond issues outstanding to $234,-000,000.

Last year the city of New York made a sale of $40,000,000 50-year 41 per cent sinking-fund bonds and $15,000,000 1 to 15 year 41 per cent serial bonds. Mr. Alfred D. Chandler, of Brookline, Mass., to whom I am indebted for much of my information relating to this particular subject and who has given it more complete consideration than any person in this country, makes this comment on this sale of bonds. illustration of the difference in the results obtained from sinking-fund and serial bonds, he said:

Such an issue of sinking-fund bonds will ultimately cost New York City $16,726,320 more than if issued in serial form, assuming that the sinking-fund earnings would for half a century average 3½ per cent, or $19,182,200 more if the sinking-fund earnings averaged 3 per cent, which is the basis of computation adopted by the State of New York. If the $40,000,000 4½ per cent sinking-fund bonds were exchanged into serial bonds at an increase of ½ per cent, or ½ per cent, or ÿ per cent, or even ½ per cent, the difference in favor of the serials would be for the 50 years as follows:

As serials at 4½ per cent.	$19, 182, 200 18, 067, 200 16, 632, 200 15, 357, 200 14, 082, 200	$16, 726, 320 15, 451, 320 14, 176, 320 12, 901, 320 11, 626, 328

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield merely for me to make a comment? In the discussion of the proposed amendment of the New York constitution having relation to serial bonds taking the place of long-time sinking-fund bonds, it was estimated that were the long-term sinking-fund bonds now issued or having already been issued by the State of New York changed into serial bonds, short-time bonds, by the time of the maturity of those bonds, bonds issued it will be remembered to the amount of $100,000,000 for the building of highways and many million dollars worth of canals, the State of New York would thereby save $40,000,000 in taxes.

Mr. WEEKS. I think I have some figures here which I will give and which will confirm the statement just made by the Senator from New York.

If the State of New York had issued its 50-year sinking-fund bonds, which now equal, principal and accrued interest, $601,071,144, in serial form, the total difference in their cost in favor of the latter method, adopting the New York State basis of 3 per cent for its sinking-fund earnings, would have been $89,977,262. If the respective outstanding bond rates, which are 3 per cent, 4 per cent, 41 per cent, and 41 per cent, had all been increased one-eighth of 1 per cent and the bonds issued in serial form, the difference in favor of the serial method would be $83,339,730. If the rates had been increased one-fourth of 1 per cent, the difference in favor of the serial method would be $76,525,535. If increased three-eighths of 1 per cent, the difference in favor of the serial bond would be $69,799,970. If increased one-half of 1 per cent, the difference would be $63,074,855, and even if the sinking fund could earn 4 per cent, the difference in favor of the serial method would range from forty to sixty-five millions of dollars.

If any other arguments were necessary to determine the desirability of a serial over a sinking-fund bond we could find impressive examples enough to justify the statement that there has been and is the greatest recklessness in the management of sinking funds. This is not alone due to the fact that they are not as economical as the serial method, but that they frequently are not used at all. This contention is verified in the case of our own Government.

The sinking-fund provisions applying to our outstanding bonds date back as far as 1862. The law reads as follows:

points date pack as far as 1802. The law reads as follows:
Revised Statutes, section 3688. There is appropriated annually, out of the receipts for duties on imported merchandise, a sum for the payment of the public debt equal to the interest on all bonds belonging to the sinking fund.
Revised Statutes, section 3689. There is appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes hereinafter specified such sums as may be necessary for the same, respectively, and such appropriations shall be deemed permanent annual appropriations.

nereinarter specified such sums as may be necessary for the same, respectively, and such appropriations shall be deemed permanent annual appropriations.

Sinking fund. Of 1 per cent of the entire debt of the United States, to be set apart as a sinking fund for the purchase or payment of the public debt, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

That law is now on the statute book, and yet no attention whatever is or ever has been paid to it, except to apply to the payment of our indebtedness the surplus revenues the Government might have from year to year. This surplus was very large during the period immediately after the Civil War and for 25 years thereafter, and it was in that way that the indebt-edness accruing during the Civil War was met.

Public sinking funds, as I have stated, have proved to be too precarious for sound finances, notwithstanding the establishment of such funds in connection with our municipal, county, and State indebtedness in the United States. Scalings down and interest defaults are reported to have exceeded a billion dollars, and to-day eight States of the Union are in default, principal and interest, to the extent of more than seventy millions of dollars. Legislators have been dilatory and irresponsive to this subject, as is witnessed by the failure to take action by Congress itself. Thirty-one years elapsed in Massachusetts between the permissive and obligatory legislation relating to serial bonds, and only recently has the second State taken any action on this subject.

The sinking funds of New York State amount to more than $40,000,000; those of New York City to more than $370,000,000. Theoretically such funds are promptly and continuously invested to yield a rate of interest above the usual bank-deposit rates, but actually millions of dollars of New York City's sinking funds are uninvested, amounting recently to $25,969,761. The average uninvested amount of New York City sinking funds during a year's time has been more than ten millions of dollars, which means a material loss of interest, and which, of course,

One of the first recognitions of the desirability of serial payments is found in the famous codicil to Benjamin Franklin's will, in which he left to the cities of Boston and Philadelphia $5,000 each, contemplating the investment thereof for two centuries, the income in part to be loaned to young married artificers, who were to repay "with yearly interest one-tenth part of the principal," which is exactly the serial-bond method.

Speaking of the New York City debt, the comptroller of that city recently stated that a 50-year $50,000,000 sinking-fund loan would show a difference between the serial and sinkingfund basis of $73,663,750 in favor of the serial system. It has been carefully estimated that if $1,000,000,000 of the New York City debt had been issued in serial instead of sinking-fund form, assuming the term to be 50 years at 4 per cent, the difference in the interest account between the two forms would amount to the amazing sum of $980,000,000.

So definitely has the correctness of this great difference been worked out that the mayor of Boston has recently petitioned the legislature to authorize the city of Boston to exchange serial bonds for the outstanding bonds of the city against which there is a sinking fund, and there is a bill pending before the Legislature of Massachusetts authorizing the Commonwealth and all municipalities in the State to exchange serial bonds for outstanding sinking-fund bonds.

In a statement before a committee having this matter in charge, Mr. Chandler recently said:

"Of the outstanding \$200,000,000 or more of sinking-fund bonds maturing between 1935 and 1958, about \$100,000,000 have an average duration of about 30 years. Assuming that only one-half of this \$100,000,000 or \$50,000,000, are exchanged into 30-year serials, the difference in the interest account in favor of taxpayers would be—assuming the same rates per cent of interest—about \$27,000,000 and crediting the sinking funds with the safe estimate on such long time as earning  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, the difference in the actual cost to the taxpayers in favor of the serials would be about \$5,250,000."

Therefore, if the Massachusetts indebtedness had an average maturity of 30 years from date and it could be refunded into new city government had recently made a levy which should serials bearing the same rate of interest, there would be a have been 5.9 mills for this purpose but was only 2.6 mills.

saving to the taxpayers of the State on this $200,000,000 of indebtedness between now and the final liquidation of the debt of about $21,000,000. It is significant that no opposition whatever appeared against this legislation at the hearing given on this subject by the committee of the Massachusetts Legislature

I have not had the time to figure the saving which might be made on the present outstanding Government indebtedness, if it were refunded into serial bonds. Indeed, I am not quite sure I could do this with accuracy, but I intend to have it done by experts so that there can be on record a complete demonstration of the desirability of changing our present indebtedness into serial form and gradually liquidating it. There is no reason why this should not be done, and from the standpoint of business prudence there is every reason why such action should be taken.

If that is true, what a piece of folly it would be to issue Panama Canal bonds or any other bonds on any other basis than as serials. As far as I know, this subject has not heretofore been given any consideration by Congress, but it will continue to appear from time to time until we have taken some At some later date I shall hope to submit to Congress a complete demonstration of what may be done with the national debt if such a policy is followed.

A somewhat careful investigation indicates that nearly every authority on the issuing of bonds prefers the serial to the sinking-fund method. M. Trinquat, a noted French writer on this subject, stated in 1899 the manifestly sane proposition that the only way of extinguishing debt, for a State as for an individual, is to use the revenue above the expenses, and that when the public frees itself from its obligation to pay its debts at maturity it encourages the incurring of new debts.

That is exactly what we are doing. We are not paying We issue bonds from time to time under any of our debts. different forms, and when those bonds mature we refund them by issuing others. The debt will keep on accumulating, and if we do not take some steps to liquidate it as it matures, at least paying it by annual installments, as I think should be done, we are going to have piled up a great volume of indebtedness without any prospect of its payment.

The French writer to whom I have referred quotes Ricardo as saying that "sinking funds rather tend to encourage expenditure than to diminish debt." Another writer, speaking of indebtedness, says that a sinking fund "acts on the public as a narcotic," and "the confidence placed in the efficacy of such methods has contributed to ease the alarm which the magnitude of the public debt would otherwise produce.

Mr. MacPherson, a leading member of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario, Canada, recently in a statement pronounced "the day of the sinking fund has passed," and that in his judgment it was a curse to the average municipality, insisting that debentures should be issued on the serial basis.

Mr. J. Hampden Dougherty, a member of the charter commission for a new charter for New York City, recently wrote:

The theory of sinking funds as security for the payment of public bts has become obsolete * * *. The commission of 1908 favors debts has become obsolete * * the abolition of all sinking funds.

And goes on to argue that the city debt of New York should be refunded.

While the provisions of the sinking fund have been considered an abundant safeguard, experience has shown that there have been many exceptions to the rule. This is particularly true in the case of railroad indebtedness, and there have been numerous instances of either dishonesty or ignorance in the application of the sinking-fund provisions. For example, I have referred to the fact that New York City within a few years had been taxed for sinking-fund provisions $19,000,000 more than the sinking fund required. In 1880 the Boston sinking funds were despoiled of $82,000. In 1904 a commission reported that $292,000 had been taken from the Boston sinking funds to pay current expenses. In 1909 the sinking fund of the city of Lynn, Mass., was reported to be $400,000 short. does not mean peculation, but that there was not enough in the sinking fund to pay the indebtedness by that amount when it matured. The funds in that case, I understand, were used for current expenses.

In the city of Chicago there has been a very general practice of using sinking funds for current expenses. One of the results of commission administration in Des Moines, Iowa, has been supposed to be its good financial record, and yet an expert analysis of Des Moines's finances recently made demonstrated shortage in its interest and sinking-fund appropriations of $438,827.77, and the investigators affirmed at that time that the

It can be seen very easily why that would be done. It reduces taxes and gives that additional amount of credit to those responsible for levying the necessary taxation to carry on the government. It is charged that the city administration has systematically evaded its obligation, and in order to keep down its tax rate an insufficient amount has been levied for sinking-

One of the few so-called authorities who has doubted the advisability of giving up the sinking funds is a Mr. Turner, a lecturer at the municipal school of finance in Manchester, Eng-In Mr. Turner's own illustration of the application of different methods of paying indebtedness he uses an example of a million pounds borrowed for 10 years and shows the following results:

Total cost. (1) Installment method _______(2) Annuity method ______(3) Sinking-fund method (5 per cent basis)_____(4) Sinking-fund method (3½ per cent basis)_____ £1, 275, 000 1, 295, 100 1, 295, 100 1, 352, 000

In other words, the serial method produced the best result. The annuity method, which means paying off not only one-tenth of the total indebtedness but one-tenth of the total interest, costs £20,110 more than the serial method. The sinking-fund method, figuring the sinking fund at 5 per cent, costs exactly the same amount; but figuring the sinking fund at 3½ per cent, the cost is £77,000 more than the serial method.

I wish to submit a table showing the results of the serial and sinking fund methods in the case of a million dollars borrowed at 3 per cent and 4 per cent, and ranging from 20 to 50 years. It is a complete demonstration of the value of the serial method. I ask unanimous consent to insert herewith the statement to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Decimal for 19 years, and 19 payments.
 Decimal for 39 years, and 39 payments.
 Decimal for 49 years, and 49 payments.

If the number of payments were to equal the full number of years, there would be an increase over the above in the saving in favor of serial bonds, the ratio of such increase being larger with the bonds of a shorter term.

If both the decimal taken and the number of payments made each equal the full number of years, there will still be a large gain in favor of the serial bonds.

Mr. WEEKS. The committee proposes to issue Panama Canal bonds without sinking-fund or serial provisions. Assuming that the only method the Government has ever used in issuing securities-namely, the sinking-fund method-were followed and the bonds were issued for a term of 50 years, as provided for in the act authorizing their issue, the cost to the taxpayers of the United States on $1,000,000 of bonds would be $173,305 more than it would cost if serial bonds were issued. It is proposed in this bill to issue the remaining $222,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds. If the sinking-fund method is applied to the payment of this indebtedness—and of course some method must be provided for liquidating it at maturity or sometime during the life of the loan—the cost to the taxpayers of this country will be $38,473,710, an amount which justifies some hesitation in passing this legislation without giving serious attention to the form of bond to be issued and the manner of its payment at maturity.

It has been charged that the serial bond is unpopular and that it requires a higher rate of interest than an issue of bonds which mature at one time, but if that condition existed heretofore, I believe it has entirely disappeared. There is now a great demand for Government bonds to use as a basis for postal interest basis on tax-exempt municipals. In the case of other savings deposits and for short-time loans to be held by the banks, Federal reserve as well as others. An issue of Government bonds having one-twentieth of its total amount maturing within a year would be eagerly picked up by a great many interests that have in the immediate future a disposal of some of their funds for a specific purpose, but want to keep them employed until that purpose has fully developed. In fact, there is no latitude to the method of liquidating an indebtedness issued under the serial plan. It is safe for the creditor and the debtor, and an immediate public exposure must be made if the debtor fails to make provision for its maturing obligations. Incidentally an indebtedness issued in this way becomes safer as it grows older, because each year a portion of it is liquidated.

In the hearing to which I have referred, which recently took place in Massachusetts, three main items of indebtedness were taken up-that is, the State's contingent obligation in the metropolitan parks, sewerage, and water loans—and it was demonstrated that the difference in favor of issuing serial bonds for this indebtedness, amounting to some fifty-six millions of dol-lars and having 40 years to run, would be something like $26,000,000, even if the bond had been issued in serial form at a one-half per cent higher rate than under the sinking-fund method. The difference in the actual cost to the taxpayers between the two methods was shown to be about $8,360,000 on a 3½ per cent basis.

I insert herewith a summary showing the indebtedness to which I have just made reference, and the possibilities if issued on a 3 or a 3½ per cent basis:

Pre-3 per cent. 31 per cent. Total. Interest. miums. $7,989,912 2,680,000 10,900,000 $2,980,000 8,350,000 23,600,000 $10,969,912 11,030,000 34,500,000 $13, 270, 652 14, 826, 000 45, 532, 875 $370, 813 739, 160 2, 300, 487 Sewerage..... Parks......Water..... 21,569,912 34, 930, 000 56, 499, 912 3, 410, 460 70, 219, 067 56, 499, 912 Total, principal and interest...

I can not emphasize too strongly the fact that the maintenance of a sinking fund is a source of a great deal of trouble, expense, and hazard. The volume of sinking funds now held by the sinking-fund commissions of the city of New York aggregate several hundred millions of dollars. Necessarily, as there must be some considerable parts of these funds uninvested, the possibility of errors and even of dishonest handling would be entirely removed if a serial form of bond were issued instead. Our Government should go out of debt, and provision should be made to refund all Government bonds on a serial basis, or, at least, reestablish a sinking fund, so that our bonds could be paid. As a financial action this should appeal to every Senator. There is no argument against it, and, from the standpoint of good finances as well as good preparedness, there is no reason why we should not pay our indebtedness promptly and systematically. If that were done, there would be no trouble about our financing ourselves in times of greatest Finally, it is, perhaps, sufficient to say that sinking funds do not in theory amortize a debt; they simply offset it. The only true amortization is extinction. The only sensible method of extinguishing a debt is to pay it in approximately equal installments, which is exactly what the serial bond does. As I have tried to point out-very inadequately, however-sinking funds are liable to misappropriation, unwise investment, and to suspension. Their average earnings are small, and, therefore, the net expense to the taxpayer is much greater than when a serial bond has been issued.

It is now generally conceded that a serial bond is much more economical to the issuing party than a bond having a sinking-fund provision. There used to be a strong prejudice on the part of bond buyers against a serial bond, because it gave a shorter average and, therefore, less spread between one basis and another; but of late years there has been such a demand for short bonds for deposit security and similar purposes that a serial bond is practically as popular with buyers as a longer bond with a sinking-fund provision. The bond should carry a higher than 3 per cent rate.

Since the diplomatic break tax-exempt municipals have risen from one-fifth to one-fourth of 1 per cent in price-I mean the municipals the rates have increased in the same proportion. Good municipal bonds in such places as Chicago and St. Louis are selling on a 4 per cent basis. Recently the State of Massachusetts sold $4,000,000 of 4 per cent serial bonds, running an average of about 9 years, on about a 3\{\frac{3}{4}}\) per cent basis, and they were retailed on a 3.60 to 3.75 per cent basis.

It is doubtful if patriotic reasons will induce people to largely subscribe for a 3 per cent bond unless we are actually engaged in war.

Mr. WEEKS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed, in connection with my remarks recently delivered, a comparison between serial-bond and sinking-fund methods, $65,000,000 at 4 per cent for 50 years, as printed in the Financial Chronicle, of New York, of the date of August 1, 1914.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS-CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on the bill (H. R. 19119) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, and that it be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will be

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19119) "making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 14, 30,

32, 43, 44, 46, 51, 54, 55, 62, 71, 85, 89, and 96,

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 45, 47, 48, 52, 53, 56, 57, 58, 59, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, 73, 74, 75, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 90, 92, and 95, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"In connection with the item contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917 providing for repaying with asphalt the roadway of Fourteenth Street NW. from Pennsylvania Avenue to F Street, 70 feet wide, the owners of the abutting property are hereby required to modify the roofs of the vaults now under the sidewalk on said street between the limits named, at their own expense, so as to permit the widening of the roadway of said street to 70 feet."

And the Senate agree to the same. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$30,000"; and the Senate agree to the

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amend-ment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert $82,415"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For matrons in the normal and high schools, including the following: Wilson Normal, Miner Normal, New Central High, Purples High, Western High, Eastern High, Dunbar High, Business High, Western High, Eastern High, McKinley Manual Training, and Armstrong Manual Training, 9 in all, at $500 each, $4,500."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "90 additional privates of class 1, at $900 each, to be employed on, or after March 1, 1917, $108,000, $27,000 of which sum to be immediately available, and the provision in the District of Columbia appropria tion act for the fiscal year 1913 which provides 'After June 30, 1912, there shall be no appointments, except by promotion, to fill vacancies occurring in classes 1, 2, and 3 of privates in the Metropolitan police until the whole number of privates in all of said classes shall have been reduced to 640, is hereby repealed"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert

$1,073,618.66"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "serologist, $2,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert

$76,540"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transpose the matter inserted by said amendment to follow the words "water service," on page 88 of the bill, in line 14; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 93, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "continuously" and insert in lieu thereof the word "regularly," and in the same line strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 94, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 6 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "Congress," insert the following: "Potomac Park"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 8, 16, 76, 87, 88, 97, and 98.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator from Maryland whether or not this is a final agreement?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. No; it is a disagreement. We further insist upon the disagreement and ask for a further conference

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator from Maryland would inform us what particular amendments are still in disagreement.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The matters in disagreement, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, are relative to the enforcement of the child-labor law, which involves the appointment of two extra persons to enforce it, instead of two policemen who are now performing that duty; another is the payment of the claim of Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller; another is in reference to the Gallinger Municipal Hospital; another is in reference to the Klingle Valley Park; another is in reference to the intangible tax, and still another is in reference to the matter of increased compensation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment, Mr. President, before the report is agreed to. It was impossible for us to understand what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Smith] was saying. The aisle was filled with Senators standing and talking. I wish to ask if the matter in reference to increased compensation is still in dispute?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That amendment is still in disagreement. Is there any further question which the Senator desires to ask in reference to the report?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, request a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. Smith of Maryland, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Gallinger conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenues to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to submit some amendments, which I intend to propose to the pending bill. I ask that they may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I intended discussing some of the features of the pending bill upon the close of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks], but my friend the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane] has prepared himself upon one subject of the bill, and now desires to proceed. So I cheerfully yield the floor to him.

Mr LANE. Mr. President, I dislike very much to take precedence of the Senator from Colorado, but I hope to be able to say something on the question of the provision of the bill relating to oleomargarine and its tax which may be of some interest to Senators—not a great deal, perhaps, and yet it is a matter, it seems to me, upon which the people should be in-It might make some difference in the choice of their foods to ignorant people who have not carefully investigated the matter, and really it ought to be our duty to let them know what they are eating; they are entitled to that information.

I have no prejudice against butter nor none against oleomargarine; but they have been confused in the presentation of the subject, as it appeared to me, and it seemed to be so confusing to others that I thought the Senate ought to know what it was voting for or against.

As for butter, it is a pure product if it is in a pure condition. The same applies to oleomargarine. Butter is an 80 to 85 per cent animal food fat made by the churning of cream. It may have tubercular germs in it or it may not have; it may or it may not have in it certain ingredients which are not cleanly. The same condition applies to both substances.

There is, however, one thing about butter. If it is a spoiled article, it is honest enough to let you know it, for, if it is rancid, you do not like its taste and you will not eat it; if it is spoiled, it does not smell good, and both your sense of taste and your sense of smell warn you against the use of it.

Oleomargarine is a mixed compound, if you please, not only of animal fats but also of vegetable oils. It is a composite mixture, which is made by chemical and other means. It is used as a substitute for butter, and it is here claimed that practically, and to all intents and purposes, it is the same as butter. It is not the same, it never was, and it can not be.

I want to show some of the reasons why oleomargarine is not the same as butter, and I want to be backed in what I state by the authorities, authorities which are unquestioned. I am going to read, first, a short note from the United States Dispensatory, nineteenth edition, published by Lippincott and edited by Wood, Remington, and Sadtler, three of the greatest chemists in the United States, and a work which is recognized all over the world. They analyze and define the constituents not only of butter but of oleomargarine. Butter is 821 per cent pure butter fat. It is defined here on page 125 as follows:

Butter is the clean, nonrancid product made by gathering in any manner the fat of fresh or ripened milk or cream into a mass, which also contains a small portion of the other milk constituents, with or without salt, and contains not less than 82.5 per cent of milk fat. By acts of Congress approved August 2, 1886, and May 9, 1902, butter may also contain added coloring matter.

Butter may also contain added coloring matter. So, by the way and by the same token, does the other article, or at least they are asking for permission to color it now.

Oleomargarine is composed of a compound series of animal fats and animal acids, if you please, combined with vegetable oil, which is also a fat, but of vegetable origin.

The definition of oleomargarine given by the Century Dictionary is as follows:

Oleomargarin, oleomargarine * * * a granular solid fat of a slightly yellowish color, obtained from the leaf-fat or caul-fat of cattle; so named by the inventor of the process of its preparation. The fat is first carefully cleaned from adhering impurities, as bits of flesh, etc., and then thoroughly washed in cold water. It is next rendered at a temperature of 130 to 175° F., and the mixture of olly products thus obtained is slowly and partially cooled till a part of the stearin and palmatin has crystallized out. Under great hydraulic pressure the parts which still remain fluid are pressed out; after a time these solidify and are ready for market. This substance has been largely used as an adulterant of butter. When oleomargarin is churned in a liquid state with a certain proportion of fresh milk a butter is produced which mixes with it, while the buttermilk imparts a flavor of fresh butter to the mass, making so perfect an imitation that it can scarcely be distinguished by taste from fresh butter. A refined fat strongly resembling that obtained from beef-fat is got from lard by similar treatment. Also, in commerce, called simply oleo.

Now, they use lard and what we commonly call tallow, and, as I will show you further, by a certain chemical process—

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator whose definition it was he read?

Mr. LANE. The definition was from the Century Dictionary, They secure a compound of a certain consistency by diluting it with cottonseed oil and butter, probably processed so that it has the appearance of butter. Then by churning it in butter-milk they get the flavor of butter, and, by adding certain coloring matter, they get the color of butter; and the unsophisticated palate can not tell it from butter, as I am told, although it seems to me that I can always detect it. It has a certain consistency owing to the fact that the fat cells in tallow are composed of three different elements. They are surrounded, in the first place, with a very strong cell membrane, which butter cells do not have. The membrane of a cell of butter fat is very fragile, as is that of whale blubber and blubber from the walrus, an easily broken-down cell, one which, if you put it in your stomach, is easily turned into a form in which it is readily digested.

If you will put upon your plate a tablespoonful of lard, a tablespoonful of tallow, and then another tablespoonful of cottonseed oil, and spread each separately upon three pieces of bread and try to eat them you will find that you can swallow the bread with the cottonseed oil upon it with a good deal of facility, for the reason that it is oily, but it will not taste good. Then if you will turn to the larded bread you can get that down by hard work, but it is sickening. If one should spread a piece of bread for you with a tablespoonful of tallow upon it and present it to you for lunch you could not swallow it, you would resent it, and if he insisted on your eating it you would have a fight with him if you had any manipus have to It would glue up the top of your mouth, and you would have to take a spoon and dig it out.

In the case of butter, if we will assume that it is all fresh and pure, you would find it palatable. You would not eat tallow if you could get anything else to eat. You might eat it if you were starving, but the tallow would not taste good to you, although it might nourish you. So would a boot or an old shoe, if it were boiled long enough and were taken out once in a while and a sledge hammer were used on it to break its fibers and it were finally worked down to a proper consistency and a little flavoring matter were put into it, say, garlic and tomato sauce, and a fricassee were made of it. Under those circumstances you could eat it; but it would not be beefsteak. It might look like beef fricasseed, but it would be fricasseed boot just the same, and it would have a certain small amount of nourishment in it, but I should not like to have it presented to you, and more particularly would I resent having it worked off on me with the straight statement that it was just as good as beefsteak. It is not beefsteak.

As I have heretofore said, all butter is not good; some of it is unfit for food; and there is no doubt that some of the cattle from which the cream is derived are tubercular. It is the duty of the Government to see-and perhaps right here in this bill would be a good place to provide a remedy for it; but, at any rate, in some bill it should be so provided—that butter be not tubercular and that the cattle from whose milk the cream is derived are free from tuberculosis, and then we will have an assurance of a product which is healthful, is one of the most palatable articles of diet which has strong nutritive value.

On the other hand, my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERwood]-and I am sorry he is not here-did not tell you, nor has anybody else or any authority quoted, from which he, so far as I know, stated that the fattest cattle, the fattest, barren cow, or milch cow which they turn into beef, for the reason that she is fat and does not give much milk, is likely to be a tuberculous cow. The tubercular animal, the one whose lungs and liver are loaded with tuberculosis, seething and teeming with it, for some unknown reason is butchered, and from the tallow of that animal, perhaps, oleomargarine is made. I will concede that before it becomes oleomargarine it is put through a process by chemical and other treatment by which the tubercular germ

The lard in oleomargarine may come from a hog, an animal which is even more susceptible than the cow to tuberculosis, and yet it goes into the pot in which they render the lard from which oleomargarine is made. It has not been far in the past when if a hog out of a carload of hogs died on a train from overheat or from being tramped to death it went bodily, hide and all, into a lard vat, and the lard was taken from its carcass and sold for food. That was despite Government regulations, for at that time Government inspectors received their salaries from the butchering establishments, the large institutions which constitute the Beef Trust. If an inspector made much complaint or if he got "real gay" about it and real indignant, he lost his job. I have seen them go out. I saw the best inspector we ever had lose his place.

So far as the source of these products-beef tallow or lardis concerned they stand upon the same basis. In either case the germs have been killed either by chemical or mechanical processes of treatment. On the other hand, it is our duty here, first of all, to render immune or to eradicate the cattle which pass along the tubercular germ which may go into butter; and by the way, I might say, for the information of Senators, that no microscopist, so far as I know, if you please, has been able to detect to any extent tubercular germs in butter. That is for the reason, perhaps, that the substance is of such consistency that he can not find them, or it may be that they do not exist I think the germs do exist there, to a certain extent, and the fault is largely with the methods of detecting them in butter

These are some of the reasons why I object to a gentleman who confessed here that he did not know what lard was made of setting himself up as an authority, and delivering a dissertation on the valuable food qualities of an artificial compound. Butter and oleomargarine are not the same. Each is entitled to consideration; each has its food value; and each is entitled to that credit, but to no more. That is why I have gone to work here to check this out.

Now, we will take an animal fat. Take beef tallow. It is made up of three component parts. I made the remark yesterday that one of these ingredients made the best boot grease in the world, and Senators will acknowledge that that remark was sensible when I explain to them what those ingredients are. There is, first, in animal fat, olein, stearin, and margarin. The olein was formerly supposed, although I think they have changed their opinion lately as to that, to be the only oily part, and the margarin was that part from which they claimed this valuable food compound was made, and the stearin-you all know what stearin is. If you think back, you gentlemen who are old enough to remember, will recall that in the old days your father and mother with your help made dip candles, and molded tallow candles. After they melted the tallow, they poured it into the molds, hung them up, and set them aside to cool, and you will remember that the old tallow candle melted down quickly, and when it was set to burning if a moth or a fly got into that candle it would burn up in a few moments and would almost smoke you out the house if you did not get the insect out in a hurry.

A little later on came a man with a brain under his hat who took cognizance of that, and separated it into its component parts. He took the stearin out of tallow fat and made a candle which would burn evenly and slowly and give a fixed and perfect light to the extent of its illuminating capacity. That was the stearin candle. You may remember 50 years ago that the old Harkness candle was the best candle, purer and far better than the old candle made from beef tallow. Any article which, unlike butter, will hold up against heat, stand heat, and a lot of it before it will melt—suggest it to yourself and you do not need to have any chemist answer the question for youis not an easily digestible fat. You may be able to get away with it, if you have a strong stomach, but it is not what you might call an ideal food.

Now, those are the component parts of the beef tallow and lard which is made into this vaunted article of food which is claimed to be an equivalent of butter as an article of diet. know better. You can go home to-night with a piece of tallow and a half pound of butter, and if you will set the butter and the tallow up alongside the stove the butter will melt away and it will become rancid in a day or two while the tallow will stand up with a smiling countenance for a week and never bat an eye. [Laughter.]

It is up to you. Anybody ought to know better than that; and yet there are arguments presented here endeavoring to prove the contrary. I have no objection to anybody eating oleomargarine if they care to do so, and I concede that as a waterproof lining to your alimentary canal or as a substitute for butter in case of starvation it may be of some use to you. Eat all you can get away with for it will help you out in a degree, but it is not butter. It looks like butter; it tastes like butter, for the reason that they have churned it in buttermilk, but it is not butter. There is an old story amongst the Irish to the effect that an Irishman met a priest one day and asked, "Who is this man who looks like a priest and dresses like a priest? Is he a good man?" The old priest replied, "I do not know him, but beware of the man who dresses like the priest and acts like the priest but is not the priest." So I say, beware of an article with which great pains have been taken to make it look like butter and taste like butter and smell like butter, and which by the use of coloring matter has the color of butter, but is not butter. It is an artificially prepared article of diet made by sophisticated gentlemen to sell to unsophisticated people for profit.

If you want any proof as to what olein is, if you should like to hear what margarine is, if you should like to hear what stearin is, I have the definitions for all of them here in the Century Dictionary; and I can read them to you or you can hunt them up for yourselves.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Read them.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the Senator brought any samples with him of these various products?

Mr. LANE. No; but I could very easily procure them; it would not be hard to procure them. Some kindly gentleman has removed my markings and put in his own, to mislead and beguile me I fear.

There are subjects discussed here by the hour which are of less vital importance to the people of this country and of less value to the bill than this question which I am discussing with you at this time. It may sound trivial to you, and yet it leads deep into the nutritive values, if you please, of the food products of the people of this country, those who will have later along to stand by this country and pull it out of stress when the impending storm breaks. I am going to make no apology to you or anyone else for discussing it. These are matters which interest us all, and to a far greater degree, perhaps, than they interest me; and yet I think that, in a way, it is a sacred subject—the matter of the food that you put into your child's stomach and feed to your wife and nourish yourself on, or try to. It deserves attention and should not be misrepresented, ignorantly, perhaps. It is said by some Senators that any talk on behalf of butter is in the interest of some great butter trust, while the talk on the other side is represented as being in the interest of the beef and oil trusts. I have no interest in either. I merely want to get the facts before you, and without prejudice, if I can do so, and I am going to try to do it for a little while, at any rate.

Now, here is the definition of "stearin." I have it marked in the dictionary.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not the steering committee, is it? Mr. LANE. Not the steering committee. Stearin is one of the component parts of oleomargarine:

An ester or glyceride-

All fats have more or less of glycerin in them-formed by the combination of stearic acid and glycerin. When crystalized it forms white, pearly scales, soft to the touch, but not greasy.

Not greasy; not much oil in it. That is the tallow from beef from which they make semiwax candles.

It is insoluble in water-

I will say also in the stomach [laughter]but soluble in het alcohol and ether.

And the country has gone dry! [Laughter.] When treated with superheated steam-

And you can not take that into your stomachit is separated into stearic acid and glycerin.

Glycerin is an irritant. Some women use it, misguidedly, thinking that it softens their skin. It does not. It dries the water out of it and is used for that identical purpose by surgeons and physicians-successfully, too, if you please.

When boiled with alkalies, is saponified.

That is, it makes soap.

That is, the stearic acid combines with the nikali, forming soap, and glycerin is separated. When melted it resembles wax.

And it does. That is why I said yesterday that your father used it, and your grandfather did, too. When there was a melting snow, he heated his boots or shoes to a state short of burning them, and then took some of this stearic acid, tallow, and beeswax and rubbed it in and cooled them, and they were watertight. That is why I said it made the best boot grease and the poorest food that one could put in his stomach. You can not protect your feet with butter, nor with any pure, straight oil, if you rub it on your boots and shoes; but you can do it if you can get enough of this oleomargarine together and separate it with a little heat. [Laughter.] This is a scientific discussion, gentlemen. I hope you will not laugh.

It is the chief ingredient in suet, tallow, and the harder fats.

Now, Senators, what makes one fat harder than another? It is the outside coating, the cellular wall. The cell wall in animal fat, such as beef tallow, is hard. It will stand an acid; and the fact is, they have to use strong acid or its equivalent to break it down in order to make oleomargarine. Nobody told you that yesterday or last night.

There was one Senator here who stated, during my absence-I have been reading it in the RECORD—that he preferred oleomargarine when he went out camping or into the mountains, for the reason that it would not melt nor spoil so quickly as He said that if he took butter into a dirty cabin it would spoil on his hands; and it will. It will not stand for it. He said also if he took it out into the hot country, while traveling, the butter would melt and become rancid. It gave up the ghost, and you could not eat it. It spoiled. Of course it would; and any other honest article of food will do the same. Go into a dirty cabin and hang up a beefsteak, and try to eat it a couple of days afterwards, and you can not do it. It will decay, and so will butter; but butter and beefsteak are honest enough to tell you that they are spoiled. He said you could take this oleomargarine and store it into this dirty cabin, or out on the plains, and it would last two weeks; and it will. You could not break its health down with anything but a club. [Laughter.] It will last you a month. I do not know but that it will last you a year. So will soap. [Laughter.] So will a brickbat, as far as that is concerned; but who wants to eat it? But that is no proof that it is food. It is no proof that it is an honest or complete substitute for food, but rather proof that it Yet that argument has been urged here with such facility and ease and assumption of a superior knowledge of the subject that it made me tired. [Laughter.] But I want to analyze it, because I studied this subject along the line of chemistry and physiology to a slight degree when I was a young man, and I was anxious to know whether or not the old principles of chemistry had been entirely changed, and I found that they had not. You want to look out when you eat it. I want to give you warning.

I find I have lost my glasses.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Are they gold?

Mr. LANE. No, sir; they are not gold. They are filled-gold glasses, and the lenses are made out of the bottom of a bottle, I have no doubt. I think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] has them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He needs them.

Mr. IANE. Now, ladies and gentlemen of the Senate [laughter], I want to dilate a little on oleomargarine, and I want you to watch it in your diet in the future. This is good medical advice which does not cost you anything [laughter], but it will be of use to you. Do not eat or feed your children any article of diet which will not spoil. It has something in it of a chemical nature, or has been put through some process or treatment which, if it renders it immune from spoiling also renders it indigestible. The Creator never intended you to eat anything which would not spoil. He laid fresh food before you, and He expected you, and it is your duty, to eat that kind and that only. Beware, as I said before, of any kind of food that will not spoil.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether he would give that advice with reference to alcohol—to take fresh alcohol—or would he rather have it aged?

Mr. IANE. Well, I will tell you, Senator—there is no good in either of them. [Laughter.] To raise my voice at this time against the talented gentlemen, masters of the English language, seems like an assumption on my part, but I will risk it.

Now, as to the coloring of oleomargarine, which the Agricultural Department, it is said, claims to be a food product which is as digestible and nutritious as butter, and always I refer to pure, clean butter. Nor can it be handled in a more filthy manner—a whole carcass of a hog thrown into the vat without even being cleaned, for its fat elements only, and beef which is seething, as I said before, with tubercular germs, afterwards purified by being submitted to chemical processes. Now, if this is so good a food, if it is in the majority of cases even better and more wholesome than butter, why try to make it smell and taste like butter by churning it in buttermilk? And why add butter to it? That is a fraud. Why color it so that it will look like good spring butter?

Of course, I will allow that the fall butter or the butter from cattle in the winter in many instances is a light-colored article. But not, as a rule, from well-fed cows of good parentage nor from a cow that is a cross between a shorthorn and a Jersey, with plenty of outdoor exercise and good food in a decent climate, does it get white. It is always yellow. In reply to the statement that such coloring is merely an appeal to the senses, I would state that it is an appeal to the common sense of the man who was raised on the farm, who saw his mother churn butter that was yellow, the cow's milk and cream being yellowish in color; and he learned when he was a baby in his mother's arms that butter tasted good, that it was good, and that he liked it. Now we are making an imitation of it out of the fat that surrounds the intestinal canal of steers and hogs. Suppose the butcher knife slips? You will have to put it through a chemical process then to fix it so that anybody would eat it if they saw it; and I have seen the knife slip.

they saw it; and I have seen the knife slip.

Then, why add cottonseed oil? Why put cottonseed oil in it?

Did you ever think why cottonseed oil goes into this very nice, tasty, and well-smelling butterine, this bogus butter? It is so that you can swallow it. You could not get it down otherwise. It does not furnish enough grease or oil to allow itself to slip into your stomach unless you give it a boost [laughter] or assistance from something which is of a more fluid consistence. Now, cottonseed oil, bar its taste, is pure, and I think it a good food, which will be more and more used as a food, and in the future it may become a substitute, or one of the substitutes, for butter; but it will be done without the addition of something which is better used and more useful to the people of this country when it is made into soap. Tallow will go further and do more good to the country as soap than it will as a substitute for butter.

As I said, our friend from New York stated here that he could go out into the mountains camping, put up in dirty cabins, and his butter would spoil, but when he went in there provisioned with this other article, oleomargarine, it would last him a month, and he ate it with a great deal of pleasure. I would not have it on my table just for that identical reason. He ought to have added just one instruction, a necessary one, that in the case of butter, when it becomes rancid you could throw it out; but if he was going to use oleomargarine, first, for his stomach's sake and for his general health's sake, he should pare or peel the outside of it off to a depth sufficient to remove the dirt as well as the germs, which could not bore a hole into its tough insides.

There is a certain kind of decay, and I want to call your attention to it. Many of you have suffered from the effects of it—not the good, old, honest, spoiled carcass, like the dead steer on the plains or out on the farm, which gives notification of its presence so that you may go and bury it, but that other insidious germ which produces a deadly decay without odor, which does not manifest itself, which goes along with certain types of cold-storage beef and fish, which does not show itself by taste nor by smell, and gives you ptomaine poisoning. That is the one to watch. The buzzard will find the other for you. You do not have to bother it or eat it, and you will not; but you do eat this other, and many men get sick and others die from it, and there is a certain kind of preservative which so preserves food that it is indigestible and unhealthful to eat.

I want to call your attention to margarine, and some more information in relation to it from this same encyclopedia or dispensatory. It is said to be in part composed of stearin. Let us see how they manufacture it into oleomargarine, and how they break down these cells so that they can make this pasty mass and this intimate mixture which you can pass over your palate without getting it glued to the roof of your mouth:

Stearin: This exists abundantly in tallow and other animal fats. It may be obtained by treating the concrete matter of lard, free from olein, by cold ether so long as anything is dissolved. The palmatin is thus taken up, and stearin remains. A better method is to dissolve suct in heated oil of turpentine—

Of course you have used turpentine to clean the paint spots off your coat or your pantaloons, and it will do it. [Laughter.] It is a strong solvent of oil and paint and other articles of that sort—allow the solution to cool, submit the solid matter to expression in unsized paper, repeat the tréatment several times, and finally dissolve in hot ether, which deposits the stearin on cooling.

They do that to express it out. There is a little difference of opinion here, a little different way of stating it, which may apply more or less to this. I have not yet had time to work it out, but that is one way in which they can procure their stearin.

This is concrete, white, opaque in mass, but of a pearly appearance as crystallized from ether, pulverizable, fusible at 66.5° C. (152° F), soluble in boiling alcohol and ether, but nearly insoluble in those liquids cold, and quite insoluble in water.

Now, there is one. Here is margarin:

Margarin: What was long known under this name was stated by Heintz in 1852 to be a mixture of stearin—

You see, stearin-this is the stuff that you have to use turpentine to extractand palmatin, and this view is now universally accepted by all authorities.

The fixed oils are liable to certain spontaneous changes, which have been investigated by Pelouze and Boudet. It appears from their researches that the oils are accompanied—

I do not ask nor suggest that any fine be placed upon the man who produces the inferior article; but it should go on its merits, and it should say, "This is a composition made of beef suct and lard, subjected to certain chemical processes"—a full statement of that-and then say, "It is colored to make it look like butter, with a certain coloring matter, the same as is used in butter; and it is made to taste like butter by rubbing it up and down or churning it in buttermilk from which true butter has been taken"; and it should be stated on the package that "No pretense is made that this is the equivalent of butter. It is an entirely different composition or compound."

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Oregon with a question for just a moment before he sits down? Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PAGE. I was very much interested in what the Senator said in regard to the healthfulness of butter; and I was reminded that when I last went to my home I sat beside my little grandson, 2 years old, and he was being fed with some bread with butter spread upon it. He would take up the bread and eat the butter, leaving the bread. I called the attention of the mother to the fact and asked if that was good for the boy, and she said: "The doctor says, yes; let him eat all the fresh butter he will; it is good for him." I should like to ask the Senator if that would be true with regard to the oleomargarine that he is speaking of?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, it has been asserted here that it is wholesome by eminent Senators who have placed in evidence pamphlets emanating from the Department of Agriculture. So far as I am concerned, I always fed my babies upon butter and advised my patients to get pure, fresh butter in a State which regulates the inspection of cattle for tuberculosis. That is my answer. All small children eat the butter first. Mine did, and yours and everybody else's will eat pure, sweet butter and leave the bread to the last, or, maybe, leave it altogether. I think they would not pay such devoted attention to oleo-margarine. More particularly, I know they would not if they knew what it was composed of.

Mr. THOMAS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator from Colorado, before he enters upon another part of his speech, if he will allow me to make an announcement, which I think ought to be made

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that at 6 o'clock I shall ask for a recess until 8 o'clock to-night, and if we do not have a quorum we will try to get it.

Mr. THOMAS resumed his speech. After having spoken for some time

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption for just a moment? Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to ask consent of the Senate to take up the amendments to the bank bill at some hour to-morrow for disposition. The time is getting very, very short; the matter is quite important; and there is no objection to it in any quarter that I know of. I do not think it would take over three-quarters of an hour or half an hour, perhaps, to pass it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator having the bill in charge is not in the Chamber just at this moment.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I was going to say that in the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons] I should be compelled to object; not that I want to interfere with the Senator's purpose, but because

Mr. OWEN. I merely wished to discharge my duty by the United States. I have done that. I will continue to try to do it.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall endeavor to be equally zealous in that regard from my own standpoint.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane] is always entertaining, frequently instructive, and generally well informed. He has given some attention to one of the subjects of this revenue bill; but I gather from his argument either that he has not read the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood], or that he has not comprehended its terms, because, if I understand it aright—and I have read it a number of times—its chief purpose is to prevent the occurrence of the very frauds and wrongs of which the Senator complains, and of which this article of merchandise seems to be susceptible.

No doubt any practice which assumes to deal in an article under false pretenses, to the injury of the public or any part of them, should be prohibited under severe penalties; and if it be true that oleomargarine is an unhealthy and unnutritious product, then, independently of any other question connected with it, its use as an article of food should be suppressed. It should not be regulated; it should not even be permitted to be sold under labels which can not be mistaken and which convey to the purchaser full information of its character.

The pure-food law was designed for that identical purpose and while its provisions have been in many instances perverted or disregarded successfully, the useful and essential object of the law was to come between the purveyor of unnutritious and unhealthful and poisonous foods and the public.

I shall assume, Mr. President, because it has not yet been seriously questioned, that oleomargarine is a healthful and nutritious food, whatever some of its constituents may be. nutritious food, whatever some of its constituents may be. Such is the verdict of the leading chemists, not only of this but of all countries. Such is the assurance of the pure-food bureau of the Agricultural Department. The Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth], whose argument has been the subject of some criticism by the Senator from Oregon, in a speech of two hours last evening to an audience of from six to eight Senators, covered this subject so fully and so clearly, and displayed such breadth of information derived not only from study but from actual experience, that I regret the great majority of the Members of this body were not present. To my mind, he exhausted the subject, leaving but little to be added to it. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall not attempt in the time I shall devote to this branch of the bill to do more than seek to fill in, as it were, a few suggestions, by way of supplement to the Senator's discussion.

Let me refer, then, to a summary of the laws of other countries upon the subject, particularly as there seems to be some misapprehension or misunderstanding as to what these It may be that the summary which I hold in my laws are. hand is not correct, but I read from the American Food Journal, and from its February number, on page 82, which prints a digest of the laws of the leading countries outside of our own:

ENGLAND.

The British law permits the artificial coloration of margarine, limits its content of butter fat to 10 per cent, limits the moisture content to 16 per cent, and requires dealers to use a wrapper marked "Margarine" for all retail sales.

HOLLAND.

The Dutch law permits artificial coloration, requires the word "Margarine" to be shown on packages displayed for sale, and also requires all goods sold to be inclosed in a wrapper similarly marked.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian law permits artificial coloration, levies a Government tax of one-half cent per pound, establishes a fat standard of 82 per cent, requires the use of 0.5 per cent each of sesame oil and potato flour (for the purpose, of making it chemically easy to distinguish margarine from butter), and requires the retail dealer to mark packages properly.

I think it is generally conceded that the German regulation of all social and industrial activities, including pure-food supply, is a model of management and regulation. Their chemists are easily the best in the world, and their autocratic system of government and the care and caution and precision which mark all their methods in the matter of social and industrial efficiency are such that if there were impurities in this foodstuff, if its effects upon the human system were as deleterious as we must conclude from the assurances of the Senator from Oregon, if it were of that pernicious character which it must be if because of the constituents which compose it the composite product is what he claims it to be, the German chemists would have long since ascertained the fact and, of course, the regulation of the country with due regard to the well-being of the people would have prohibited its use or have confined it to those which were innocous.

FRANCE.

The French law prohibits the artificial coloration of margarine and does not permit its sale in stores where butter is sold. It requires retail dealers to display "Margarine" signs and to mark their packages

GERMANY.

The German law permits the artificial coloration of margarine, requires the use of 10 per cent of sesame oil, and stipulates that manufacturers' packages shall be marked with a red streak 2 centimeters large on containers with height up to 35 centimeters, and at least 5 centimeters on higher containers, and that retailers' packages shall be properly marked and labeled as "Margarine." It does not allow the mixing of butter with margarine and probibits the handling or manufacture of margarine in places where butter and cheese are made or handled. It does not allow margarine to be put up in "butter shapes" and specifies that manufacturers must make their location known to the authorities and furnish information regarding materials, methods, etc., when required.

It will be noticed, Mr. President, that the German regulations are more specific and are given more in detail than those of the other countries.

NORWAY AND SWEDEN.

In Norway and Sweden the law permits artificial coloration and requires the use of a certain percentage of sesame oil. It prohibits the manufacture of margarine in creameries where butter is made and places the margarine manufacturer under Government inspection. It requires dealers to display a sign when selling margarine and manufacturers' and retailers' packages to be labeled or marked "Margarine." It also requires that margarine must be packed in containers whose length is twice their width.

DENMARK.

The Danish law permits artificial coloration of margarine up to a certain standard established by the Government, requires the use of a certain percentage of sesame oil, and stipulates that a red band shall be placed around the outside of each original or shipping package, and that each package shall be plainly marked "Margarine."

It is observable, Mr. President, that in all the leading European countries this article is regarded as a pure-food product and is subject to regulation not to exclude it from the market but to enable people to get it for what it is, not for what it might pretend to be.

In this connection it may be interesting to refer to the proportionate quantities of oleomargarine that are consumed in these countries. I read from the same magazine:

these countries. I read from the same magazine:

At the time of the last census (1909) there was manufactured in this country a total of approximately one and one-half billion pounds of butter, of which very nearly 1,000,000,000, or 60 per cent, was manufactured on the farms, some 6,361,502 in number, the balance of 624,764,653 pounds being a product of the factories. The same year, 1909, there were manufactured some 92,000,000 pounds of margarine, which figure has in the interval between 1909 and 1916 increased to 152,183,085 pounds. At the time of taking the last census the population of this country was about 90,000,000. Thus it will be seen that our annual per capita consumption of table fats is in the neighborhood of 19½ pounds, the eleomargarine consumption per capita being 1½ pounds, and the balance consisting of butter.

That would be 18 to 14 as the proportion in this country of

That would be 18 to 11 as the proportion in this country of the relative consumption of butter and of oleomargarine.

It is interesting to compare these figures with the annual per capita consumption in Great Britain, which was before the war 17 pounds of butter and 8½ pounds of margarine, a total of 25½ pounds.

Just here let me digress, Mr. President, to say that if any object lesson were necessary to support the proposition that competition between butter and oleomargarine properly placed upon the market does not, indeed, can not, interfere with or reduce the amount of butter produced or affect the business injuriously, it is given by these statistics from Denmark, which is not only the greatest butter country in the world but it produces the best, and consequently commands the market without regard to competition.

In Denmark the annual per capita consumption of margarine is 43 pounds, more than twice the total consumption of table fats in this country. In Norway the annual per capita consumption of margarine is 33½ pounds, and in Holland, 20 pounds, the consumption of butter not being a matter of record.

So that in other countries, concerned as we are with the distribution of pure-food products, concerned as we are with the protection of the people against impure or pretended ones, this has become a staple article of diet, nutritious, desirable, and, as the Senator from New York said last night, filling a space in the demands of the people in which butter does not enter at all.

Now, what is the situation in this country? We have a law, placed upon the statute books in 1902, which was designed, whatever may be said about it, to crush one American industry for the benefit of another, which invoked the taxing power of the Nation—and that is the power to destroy—for the protection of one legitimate industry against another, both of them being American. I can understand how an extreme advocate of protection, how a man who believes in that principle, might square his conscience with the application of the principle to two American industries, both entitled to the protection of the law; but I am unable to understand how any Democrat who must believe that taxes should be placed upon wealth instead of consumption, and that the taxing power should not be used for any other purpose than the raising of money for public expenditures and public needs—how such a man can for a moment hesitate to vote for this amendment is beyond my comprehension.

A government, Mr. President, ceases to be a government of the people when its power and authority are used to benefit one part of the people by destroying another part of the people. A government is not fit to be called republican which utilizes its taxing power to make one business prosperous at the expense of another, each of them domestic enterprises and each contributing to the support of the Government and entitled to the protection of its laws. This law runs absolutely counter to that theory and practically operates in favor of, for the benefit and protection of, a great American industry by shielding it I from possible competition in the use of an article whose competition it fears.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Mc-CUMBER] said yesterday that there was no objection upon the part of anyone-certainly not of the butter makers of the country-to the sale of margarine as margarine; that the objection was to the sale of margarine as butter; and that any law which enforced the sale of margarine as such was not open to serious objection. Of course, I do not pretend to give the Senator's exact language. The pending bill is designed to do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President-

Mr. THOMAS. I yield. Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I think I went a little further than that and said anything that would force its use as margarine and not as butter would be entirely satisfactory to us.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator for the addition he has made to my understanding of his position.

Mr. McCUMBER. That means the use to the man sitting at the table, that he may know what it is.

Mr. THOMAS. The existing law does not do that. The existing law from the very sense of injustice and wrong which it inspires prompts a disregard of its requirements. Not only so, but under it the butter dealer and the butter maker, as was demonstrated last night by the Senator from New York, utilize its prohibition to fraudulently and wrongfully color oleo-margarine and sell it as butter to their own customers. Hence every Commissioner of Internal Revenue from 1902 down to this day, a majority of the collectors all the country over, have recommended consecutively and consistently the repeal of this statute.

It is not a revenue producer; it can not be. It levies one-quarter of a cent a pound upon oleomargarine. That produces practically all the revenue that is paid into the Treasury from this tax except that which is collected from licenses and through the detection of violations and punishment by way of fine. cents on the colored article is intended to be prohibitive.

Mr. President, as the law now stands no man is prevented from selling oleomargarine as butter provided he is willing to pay the 10 cents a pound upon it. Of course he can not do it, because the existing competition will not permit it. But more oleomargarine is sold every day under that law as butter through the ease with which the law can be taken advantage of, through the temptation of the great profits that follow in its wake, than perhaps any other revenue law, proportionately speaking, of course, that we have upon the statute books, and the Government does not get the benefit of it. Neither is the public protected against this food product, which, according to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], is so pernicious in its origin.

It was said yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Penrose], and I concede without reservation the justice of his position, that if oleomargarine is as we declare a nutritious product, and if it is entitled to its place in the trade of the country, we ought not to tax it at all any more than we would tax butter. That is true. This tax, Mr. President, is an imposition, or would be if it were not for the fact that it is one of the conditions essential to compel those who produce it to sell it as oleomargarine and not as butter and pay the resulting tax.

The Senator from North Dakota looks at this amendment from a different viewpoint than I do. He opposes it because he does not think it will protect the butter maker, while I advocate it, first, because it is absolutely opposed to my notions of what the taxing power should be used for, and, second, because it will produce that very condition which will be satisfactory to him and to those who are engaged in the butter industry.

I can not conceive, Mr. President, how this material can be labeled differently or better than is provided in this bill in order to protect the public. I know it is said that these original packages may be purchased by the grocer or by the hotel or restaurant proprietor and then served to the customers as butter; consequently, it does not go far enough. But that, Mr. President, is true of every food product a label upon which is required under the food law. We may not be able to guard against it. Time may disclose a remedy for it. But, Mr. President, certainly when we make the same re-quirements or similar requirements to those made with regard to other food products under the pure-food law, and make it an offense to dispose of these packages except to the ultimate purchaser or consumer or to sell them after the package itself is broken, then surely no man can complain that the law is at all incomplete or inoperative with regard to the thing required to be done for the protection of the public.

Mr. President, it may be wrong to change the natural appearance to the eye of a product for the purpose of getting a better price, but if so, then the wrong is the subject of a general practice, not alone in the matter of oleomargarine but a great many other things as well.

It was said yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth] that 90 per cent of all the butter produced in this country is colored and about 10 per cent of it is sold without coloring-in other words, it is a natural yellow. Why should the creamery man insert a vegetable coloring matter into his product in order to make it yellow if he does not contemplate a fraud upon the purchaser? I know it is said that he colors butter and he sells butter. I concede that; but he gets a better price for his butter than he otherwise would, and the purchaser exchanges his money for it under the impression that he is buying something which possesses its natural color. If he were undeceived he would demand it at an inferior price. It is the element of gain in each instance which controls the use of this foreign matter, and if the oleomargarine man should be penalized for coloring his product then also should the dairyman be penalized for doing the same thing.

I do not care, Mr. President, to go into the question of purity, either relative or absolute, of these different and contending products. Nevertheless, in view of what has been said and reiterated so many times upon the subject, let me call attention to an article in the American Food Journal by its editor, Mr. Rebert Gordon Gould, regarding it. He says:

All the butter made in creameries

I read from page 84 of the American Food Journal for Febru-

Of the butter made in creameries there is a certain part which is an absolutely safe, high-grade product—the pasteurized whole-milk creamery butter. Nonpasteurized whole-milk creamery butter might be described as a high-grade product which may or may not be safe. The third general division of creamery butter is that made by the so-called centralizing plants, where cream is received from the farmers located far and near. This butter is not generally considered as of as high a quality as that coming from the whole-milk creameries; but, on the other hand, it is handled, for the most part, in a way which renders it quite safe for human consumption. The centralizing plants which pasteurize all cream received must be given the credit for turning out a product which is extraordinarily good, in view of the poor raw material with which they are obliged to work. In 1912 the Bureau of Animal Industry reported that a recent investigation had shown that 61 per cent of the cream received at creameries and buying stations was of third grade—that is, "dirty, decomposed, and sour." The same report showed that pasteurization was practiced in but 27 per cent of the creameries and that 94.5 per cent of the creameries were insanitary to a greater or less degree. Since that time there has been considerable improvement in the commercial butter business, but there is undeniably room for more. Dairymen and creamery men have no hesitancy in going on record at conventions and elsewhere as to the wisdom of pasteurization, sanitary methods of manufacture, and other laudable improvements in their business; but when it comes to putting their professions of faith into good works they display a strange hesitancy.

Now, let me turn to page 83 for a moment and read from an

Now, let me turn to page 83 for a moment and read from an extract from McKay and Larsen in their Principles and Practice of Butter Making. They say:

of Butter Making. They say:

As to the quality of American butter, McKay and Larsen in their Principles and Practice of Butter Making state that "The observations of the authors have been that the reputation of the American butter is not all that is desirable on the English market. Some American butter is good enough to sell on an equality with Danish butter, and in some instances it is palmed off for such. Much poor butter, however, has been allowed to go on the English market, and this has in some measure ruined the reputation of our butter. * * * The standing of the different kinds of butter, as observed on the English market, ever as follows: (1) Fresh French rolls; (2) Danish creamery; (3) Irish creamery; (4) New Zealand; (5) Canadian, Australian, Argentine, United States, and Siberia. For storage purposes: (1) Danish, (2) New Zealand, (3) Siberia. Thus it will be seen that in the eyes of Great Britain there is but one worse butter than ours, and that comes from Siberia. Furthermore, for the purpose of storage—the crucial test of any butter—our butter is not even considered, although that of Siberia is so used.

I might read other extracts from this article, which is a very illuminating one, but I do not think it is necessary. I might, however, refer briefly to what is called "ladle butter." Perhaps the term "rendered butter" might be as expressive, and which, by a system of working over, butter which has soured from exposure to the atmosphere or has absorbed extraneous and undesirable matter, is presented by the creameries to their customers as fresh butter. I read from page 89:

In the early eighties there was worked out a very clever scheme for the renovation of bad butter. Realizing that the fermentation respon-sible for the spoilage of butter was confined to the nonfat elements of the butter—the casein, milk-sugar, and other compounds—a process was devised which consisted in melting the butter and holding it at about 120° F. for several hours, or until the curd settled out. The clear butter oil is then run into a second tank, maintained at about the same tem-

A process somewhat similar to the rudimentary processes in the manufacture of oleomargarine

Through this tank is forced from the bottom upward air, the aeration removing practically all undesirable odor and flavor and resulting in a product which is almost tasteless and which is quite free from objectionable features. The purified oil is then emulsified with sour milk. This, of course, is necessary in order to bring back the natural butter flavor and the components of normal butter. The emulsification takes place in a cylindrical tank supplied with a rapidly revolving dasher. When fully emulsified the product is run into a vat of cold water, which sudden change in temperature brings about crystallization in the butter. The butter crystals are removed from the surface of the vat, allowed to drain and ripen for a few hours, then they are salted and worked as is normal butter.

And that is placed upon the market and sold to unsuspecting customers as the genuine article.

It is a nutritious food, Mr. President. The great heat to which it has been subjected destroys all impurities and germs possibly lurking within, and the resulting product is wholesome. It is called "process butter." But how much of it is worked off on the public as genuine butter, fresh from the cow?

I mention this, Mr. President, to emphasize the fact that there are tricks in other trades than ours, and that in this matter of supplying the public with a nutritious and wholesome product called butter there is resort to as many schemes and strategems for spoils as are charged against the oleomargarine people and against both the oleomargarine producers and the vendors of butter, taking shelter behind the provisions of this law and palming off on the public a product from which they realize an enormous profit as butter.

It is true, I have no doubt, that some great combinations are interested in the passage of this bill. The answer to the protest of the butter makers is made in behalf of the cottonseedoil companies and the Western Live Stock Association. I am not pretending, Mr. President, that this law if passed will not benefit those institutions. I presume it will benefit every man who raises animals for the market, and there are as many of them as there are men who sell milk to the creameries.

Certainly, Mr. President, because one combination or two combinations or half a dozen, if you like, make a perfectly proper use of their rights and privileges in the presentation of arguments in behalf of a given piece of legislation, we should not object to it, provided their argument is cogent and their purpose and operation public. Both sides to this controversy, so far as I know, have discussed it before the committees and elsewhere in a perfectly proper and legitimate manner.

But, Mr. President, there is also such a thing as a butter trust, largely, perhaps, the offspring of this oleomargarine legislation, having its headquarters in the city of Elgin, Ill., which sets the price of every pound of butter consumed in the country, which is a hard-and-fast organization, quite as powerful, so far as public consumption is concerned, as any combination which is or can be interested in this question. On the 5th of last December the New York World published an article upon the subject, which I shall not read in full, but insert in my remarks. The headlines inform us that:

Three Illinois men every week set price of butter for the United Carefully protected by legal safeguards, on one sale of 25 tubs of 60 pounds each weekly, they establish the average annual cost of 60,000,000 pounds of the product valued at $18,000,000, approximately—Premium paid by a few Chicago dealers, based on the Elgin standard, to a few creameries the bane of the trade, says reform member of the Elgin

These gentlemen, as usual with all such combinations, fix the price to the consumer on the one hand and to the producer upon the other, just as the old darky set his 'coon trap " to ketch 'em a-comin' an' a-gwine." It always works in both directions.

CHICAGO, December 4

Three men travel every Saturday morning from Chicago to Elgin, Ill., 39 miles on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway. There at noon in the assembly room of the Elgin Board of Trade they fix the weekly quotation for Elgin creamery butter. The telegraph and cable carry their decree to every merchandising center in the country and to every market in the civilized world to which the export trade of the country extends, and it forms the basic prices for all grades of table butter until these food arbiters meet again.

A necessity of life, required upon the table of every man in this country, is dominated by three men in the comparatively small city of Elgin, and the millions of farmers who produce the milk and cream from which this product is realized must sell their butter fat at the price also fixed by these dictators. This article goes on to say that on the 28th day of April, 1914, the United States Court for the Northern District of Illinois abolished, or thought it had abolished, this iniquitous combination; but, Mr. President, some one once defined "chancery" as "a race between the rogue and the judge," and I do not know of any better illustration of the truth of the definition or its aptness than the manner in which this decision was avoided, while the evil sought to be crushed survived it.

CAREFULLY HEDGED ABOUT TO AVOID COLLISION WITH LAW.

So carefully have these men hedged themselves about with legal safe-guards that investigators of the Department of Justice and representa-tives of the United States district attorney at Chicago, who have for weeks maintained a close espionage upon their deliberations and the system by which they arrive at their valuations, have been unable so far to find any evidence that there has been any violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

The investigation, moreover, has revealed no legal proof, apparently, that there has not been observed to the letter the permanent injunction handed down April 28, 1914, by United States District Judge K. M. Landis in the suit of the Government against the Elgin Board of Trade, prohibiting that institution—

"From appointing or authorizing the appointment of any officer, agent, or committee of said Elgin Board of Trade, whether of one or more persons, to fix or suggest the price of butter;

"From maintaining a quotation committee or any other committee or agency of said Elgin Board of Trade or its membership which shall fix a price or prices of butter;

"From requiring, compelling, or demanding by board rule, by-law, or otherwise that the members of said Elgin Board of Trade use the quotations or prices of butter which are made by means of transactions upon said Elgin Board of Trade as a basic price in contracts for the purchase or sale of butter in interstate commerce;

"From making fictitious or washed or pretended sales or purchases of butter for the purpose of misleading any person or persons as to the actual price at which butter is being sold upon said Elgin Board of Trade, or which are intended to be used in any way as a basis for the making of quotations of prices on said Elgin Board of Trade;

"From making or participating in or knowingly permitting on said Elgin Board of Trade at any time any sale or purchase of butter that is not a bona fide transaction in which the seller in good faith intends to deliver the commodity and the purchaser in good faith intends to accept and pay therefor;

"From making or participating in or knowingly permitting to be made any sale or purchase of butter on said Elgin Board of Trade in pursuance of any combination or conspiracy by or between any two or more persons or corporations to raise or lower or affect the price of butter on said Elgin Board of Trade, and thereby to raise or lower or affect the price of butter in interstate commerce;

"From making or causing to be made any offer to buy or sell butter on said Elgin Board of Trade at a price which has been agreed upon by any two or more of the members of said board or by any one or more of said members and any other person or persons prior to the making of said offer."

It is difficult to conceive of a more sweeping order than

It is difficult to conceive of a more sweeping order than this. It would seem to cover every possible emergency and to forestall the genius of man in devising a means of escaping from it.

BOARD REORGANIZED.

After the issuance of this decree the entire official personnel of the board was changed at the succeeding annual election, Charles H. Potter, of the reform element, replacing as president, John Newman, who had held that position for nearly a quarter of a century; Frederick Grell supplanting G. H. Gurler as vice president, and W. W. Sherwin and L. L. Taylor succeeding as treasurer and secretary J. P. Mason and Colwin W. Brown, respectively. These men, with the addition of E. C. Hawley and Frederick R. Moles, have since formed the board of directors.

Singularly enough it was almost wholly through the efforts of and information furnished by Frederick R. Moles, the last mentioned of these men, with whom an interview is given below, that the Government was able to obtain the evidence of collusion in price fixing by which it won its suit.

In obedience to the injunction the Elgin Board of Trade amended its charter and abolished its price committee, substituting therefor the present system, by which an informal committee of members, consisting of three or more—three being necessary for a quorum—meet every week and fix the quotation on an actual sale of butter. These members volunteer for the task. In theory the committee may embrace the entire membership of the board, consisting of 275 membrace the entire membership of the board, consisting of 275 membrace and the informal committee may embrace the entire membership of the board, consisting of 275 membrace and the informal committee it consists generally of the three men—seldom the same—who journey each week from Chicago for their self-appointed task.

Preparatory to their deliberations the secretary of the Elgin Board of Trade posts on the call board the amount of butter offered for sale at a minimum price and the amount for which there is a bid at the maximum price. A transaction is invariably effected at a level between these prices satisfactory to the producer and the bidder, and this sale, apparently bona fide, so far as the observations of the Federal authorit

APPARENTLY MEET REQUIREMENTS.

To the extent as outlined above, the system now in use meets apparently all the requirements of the law and the injunction, but in practice the sale of 25 tubs, each containing a maximum of 60 pounds, fixes the price week in and week out for the 60,000,000 pounds of so-called Elgin creamery butter, having a wholesale valuation of $18,000,000, annually produced, according to the records of the Elgin Board of Trade—and all other grades as well

That this investigation may be eminently fair, the representative of the World obtained the records of the weekly sales on the board during the season of the maximum butter production in the Elgin district—June and July. During these two months of last summer the greatest number of sales made at the weekly price-fixing session were as follows:
Saturday, June 17, 175 tubs; Saturday, July 1, 250 tubs; Saturday, July 8, 275 tubs; Saturday, July 15, 175 tubs.

So, taking this total, reached in a season when the creamery men of the Elgin district send their maximum output to the market, only 875 tubs passed through the price-fixing medium of the board of trade, while the minimum total of receipts in Chicago is about 124,000 tubs a month.

month.

During October last the maximum weekly sales on the Elgin Board of Trade exceeded 25 tubs only once, when on Saturday, October 28, the aggregate amount contracted for on the call board was 50 tubs.

Here we have the main objection to the system in practice at Elgin, assuming that there is no collusion whatever between any of the parties in interest in these small weekly sales. It will be seen that, taking them at their maximum, they constitute an infinitesimal unit upon which to fix the price of millions of pounds of butter that go into annual consumption.

THE ORIGINAL BOARD.

The Elgin Board of Trade was originally formed in 1872 to protect to butter and cheese producers of the Fox River Valley district of the butter and cheese producers of the Fox River Valley district of Illinois.

Through the operations of the board a producers' market was established, by means of which the manufacturers and the buyers were brought together once a week. At first the buyer and seller would meet in the exchange room, and after completing their deal would report their trade to the secretary, which was known as a regular sale, and which fixed the weekly quotations for Elgin butter and cheese at Chicago and other adjacent cities.

But the offerings and transactions soon became so large that a regular call board was established, where the name and factory could be written down on a large board, giving the number of tubs of butter or boxes of cheese offered, usually at a minimum price. The buyer could then take the price offered or make his bid, and thereby the quotation for Elgin products was established.

In this way everything went smoothly until 1896, when butter sold on the call board in April at 13 cents a pound, and in September at 14 cents a pound. The offerings of that season were so large and the bids and sales often varied so much that it was seldom that a uniform quotation could be established, and as the contract system had become somewhat common, the dealer contracting for the make of a certain factory at the established weekly price, the condition of the trade became so chaotic that it was decided to create a quotation committee of five members to report a quotation governing contracts.

HOW THE METHOD CHANGED.

members to report a quotation governing contracts.

How the method of fixing the quotations until the Government found by its investigation that these prices were being arbitrarily arranged and that they bore only a remote relation to the operations of the law of supply and demand. Then came the injunction. With the price of Eigin creamery as a standard the Chicago butter dealers grade their bid prices downward, paying only the premium price to certain creameries located on the lines of the various railroads entering Chicago, where the best classes of facilities for refrigerating the product and shipping it expeditiously in refrigerating cars to the Chicago market can be provided.

This system of premium paying is one of the greatest abuses that has crept into the butter trade, according to F. R. Moles, the reform member of the Elgin Board of Trade, above referred to, who is still fighting for equitable practices in the industry.

"The greatest detriment to the butter trade in general and the bane of all honest dealers," said Mr. Moles yesterday to the World representative, "is the practice of a few Chicago dealers of paying premiums to a few creameries which have exceptional facilities for manufacturing butter and shipping it to market. This premium, based on the Elgin standard, really fixes the basis for the general buying of cream and butter fat throughout the United States.

"The reason why this premium paying should be prohibited is that it is misleading to the butter consumer in general and unfair to 95 per cent of the butter producers. The quotations thus fixed are too high for the quality produced in general.

"As a matter of fact, the whole system is wrong. To fairly establish a market value all of the butter actually coming into the market daily should be reported in pounds or tubs at prices it is actually sold for.

"For instance, the quotation at the week's close for creamer extra 18 422 cents, and the daily receipts in Chicago were approximately 6,000 tubs. A very small percentage of this grades as

HIGH PRICES PAID FOR MILK.

To what extent the weather conditions of the last season, the increased consumption due to prosperous times, and to the extraordinary demand from Europe enter into the present high cost of butter is a question upon which there is a wide difference of opinion, but undoubtedly they are, to a degree at least, exercising a legitimate influence upon prices.

edly they are, to a degree at least, exercising a legitimate prices.

It is a fact established by the World's investigation that the purchasing agents of the milk condensers have been offering unprecedentedly high prices for milk in competition with the creameries throughout the butter and cheese manufacturing districts of the West. Indeed, they have been offering a higher price than the creameries could pay in many instances.

For instance, in one district in Wisconsin they freely offered $2 a hundred pounds for milk, which, translated into butter, means a wholesale price of 50 cents a pound for the butter itself, and yet it is said that they can only fill 50 per cent of the orders from the allies.

Mr. President, we hear much in these days of the lack of respect for and the weakening of the public confidence in our courts. A very prominent leader of the labor unions the other day was said to have asserted before a committee of the other House that if certain legislation were enacted he and his organization would not regard it. The papers commented, and very justly, upon this bold and defiant statement of a citizen, bound to observe our laws and to respect them, as are others, but these circumventions of the decrees of the courts, these methods and tricks through which their purposes are avoided and their effect neutralized, are apt to be regarded as evidences of sound business genius; but those who have to foot the bills for necessities, especially those who are informed of these court proceedings and their barrenness, can not well be censured if they conclude that the processes of the American Government are not sufficiently powerful to meet and discharge the tasks and responsibilities which modern monopolies put upon them.

Here is a solemn decision of a court of the United States after full hearing decreeing the existence of a monopoly, judicially recognizing a practice to be pernicious and tending to rob the people of their substance, yet within the short space of two or three months it has been rendered absolutely innocuous, and the evil goes on, the decree to the contrary notwith-

The other day a citizen cf Chicago was discovered to have on storage I do not know how many millions of eggs—sixty or seventy-five millions, I believe—who openly declared his purpose to hold them until the needs of the public forced the price up to a point where he could clear the profits that he demanded. Investigation was had, and it was discovered that he was violating no written law of the country, and was therefore within his rights. A few days afterwards he unloaded, and his profits were reflected in the needs and the sufferings of hundreds of thousands of people in this country. If there is no law, Mr. President, to reach that sort of thing, there ought to be.

When I read of the riots in the cities of New York and Philadelphia on yesterday and the day before—food riots—at a time when we are boasting of a prosperity without parallel in the history of civilization, when it is said that every man who desires it can obtain employment at good wages, I felt that there was some justification in the action of those starving people in this Elgin creamery combination, the Chicago egg combination, and in the impression that the Government of the United States was powerless to control them and similar combinations.

Mr. President, it would seem that the people of the country are actually governed not by their elected officials, not by their constitutions, but by combinations in business, whose edicts are absolutely final, which are based upon greed and upon avarice and which are sucking the financial life blood from the veins of the people.

I believe that this amendment will tend to relieve that situation and at the same time safeguard every purchaser of oleomargarine. Like the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane], I think I prefer butter. I have eaten both products freely many times, and perhaps I have eaten oleomargarine as butter more times than I am aware of. I have never yet heard that it was unnutritious, and therefore, Mr. President, there can be no substantial, material reason why provision should not be made whereby the one can enter the market, properly labeled, of course as well as the other.

course, as well as the other.

There is said to be a shortage of butter in the country. That is one excuse given for its high price. Be it so. Then, there is the greater need for the use of something which will help to supply the demand that the amount of butter in the country can not entirely fill, and I should think, Mr. President, that the farmers of the country engaged in producing milk and cream and patronizing their local creameries would be interested in whatever would relieve them of their thralldom to a combine represented by three men in the United States, and always at a point where the margin of profit to the immediate combination will not only be certain but enormous.

I presume my experience is that of other Members of this body, Mr. President. For the last 10 or 15 days I have received—I do not know how many—telegrams from acquaintances and friends, from chambers of commerce and creameries, from farmers and others, all of them of like import, inveighing against the Underwood amendment to this bill and declaring that it will be the ruin of the butter industry of the country.

But, Mr. President, it is our experience, and has been ever since revenue legislation was necessary, that the interests affected are apt to protest and declare that if the threat of legislation is carried into execution their business will be ruined. I do not recall any exception to that rule. We ruined more industries a few years ago through our change of the tariff law than there were industries in the country; yet they seem to be doing pretty well. We took the tariff off a great many articles, but, strange to say, a great many of them immediately rose in price, if not in quantity produced, and I think they rose in both. I recall wool particularly. The fact is that it is an apprehension, and an apprehension only, entertained with perfect honesty by most of those who express themselves, but an apprehension nevertheless.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. How about shoes and leather?
Mr. THOMAS. Shoe and leather were among the products which not only would suffer but would, through our tariff legislation, go out of business and become a charge upon the public. It is the natural fear born of the interests to be affected; and, after all, we are governed in all we do by our fears and our prejudices, rather than by our judgment; but, Mr. President, the impulse of this vast mass of protests coming by telegraph to Members of this body centers directly in Elgin, where the business is controlled and where the prices are fixed that must be observed if we are going to have any butter at all. I am satisfied that 95 per cent of the signers of these telegrams have not studied the question, and simply take their conclusions at second hand, and, adopting them, rush to the telegraph office and send their dispatches to influence us in our legislation.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to speak upon this subject so long as I have, because it has been so fully covered by others; but, before I leave it, I desire to refer to the revenue side of it.

This Government must have additional revenue. The Democratic Party may be to blame for this necessity; but that is beside the question. We must have revenue. Preparedness has much to do with it; the increase of governmental activities has very much to do with it; the painful absence of economy in our financial administration has everything to do with it; but the fact is we need money and we must have it. Now, Mr. President, I must ask the Senator from Alabama just what the estimate of the revenue under this amendment is? I do not know that I have the figures exactly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not the letter in my desk; I sent it over to my office last night; but the estimate made by the Treasury Department was that under the present law there was raised from the oleomargarine tax on colored and uncolored combined a little less than $1,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the present revenue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the present revenue. The tax on dealers brings that amount up to nearly a million and a half dollars. It is estimated that under this proposed tax on oleomargarine of 2 cents and the dealers' tax combined the revenue will amount to $5,000,000, which would make an increase of three and a half million dollars by this change. My own judgment about it is that it would be in excess of that amount. I think that the estimate of the Treasury Department is extremely conservative.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is true that three and a half million dollars is hardly small change for the Government of the United States nowadays; but every little helps, and if by the raising of this revenue we can give a legitimate American industry an equal chance under the laws of the country, prevent the sale of the product under false pretenses, but always for what it is, to those who want it, it is and will be, both as a revenue getter and as an act of justice, a piece of beneficent legislation.

Why, Mr. President, if this method of procedure—and I am speaking now of the present law—is American, if it is just, if it is equitable, if it has a single practical principle to support it, then there is no reason in the world why the Congress can not penalize peanut oil for the protection of cottonseed oil, lard for the protection of tallow, lead for the protection of copper, or any other industry for the protection of something with which it is or might come in competition. The principle is so monstrous to my mind that the mere statement of it carries with it its own refutation. The only possible justification for such legislation is that the product which is penalized is impure and therefore dangerous to the public.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And in that case it should not be allowed at all.

Mr. THOMAS. And, as the Senator from New York suggests, in that case it should not be allowed at all; but when it is admitted that that is not true, that the industry is legitimate, that the article produced and dealt in is wholesome and nutritious and entitled to make its way upon its own merits in the markets of the country, in free America certainly, it should not be subjected to suppression by hostile legislation in the interest of something that fears injury from it.

of something that fears injury from it.
Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—
Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would explain to me how we penalize uncolored oleomargarine in the present law? I am referring now only to uncolored oleomargarine.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think the law, if we are to regard it merely as applicable to uncolored oleomargarine, penalizes that product by the imposition of a tax of one quarter of a cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, is it not true, if I may say a word further, that the only thing we penalize is the coloring of white oleomargarine yellow in order to perpetrate a fraud upon the We do penalize the fraudulent part of it; we do penalize the coloring of it in imitation of butter, because we know that it is only in that form that it is able to perpetrate a fraud

Mr. President, when we penalize the oleomargarine producer for giving an artificial color to his product and allow his competitor to give that same artificial color to his product, which he does as to 90 per cent of it, the former is penalized. I know it is said that the color that is applied to butter is applied to the genuine article, and consequently the man who colors it does not sell colored oleomargarine, but he sells colored butter. Yet he colors it, Mr. President, to get a better price for it, for the customer believes when he buys it that it is naturally yellow butter. The difference is not in kind but in degree, and not much in degree when you apply it to process butter, which has its impurities worked out and colored and sold to the public as fresh butter.

If it were necessary, if the butter was yellow, for example, and it was necessary to prevent a fraud, to prevent, under heavy penalties, the use of artificial coloration, the proposition would be a different one, but that is not the situation. from New York [Mr. Wadsworth] said last night, 90 per cent of all butter is white, and there is a very considerable per cent of natural oleomargarine that is yellow. So I can not escape the conclusion that the act of 1902 was designed to, and did, penalize a legitimate industry under the pretense that it was necessary to protect some other industry against fraud, and the melancholy part of it is that the protected ones are those who largely use the situation to defraud the public and palm oleomargarine off upon them as butter.

Now, Mr. President, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate longer upon this part of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. Suffice it to say that I had occasion in 1913 to investigate this subject, and again during the fall of 1914, when the so-called war-revenue bill was under consideration, and also last year, on each of which occasions the Commissioner of Internal Revenue called attention to this act, to the manner of its operation, and suggested that these changes be made in it.

I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have listened to the greater part of the argument of the Senator from Colorado upon this subject; and if his argument is sound, I think he will agree with me that it leads to the conclusion that there ought not to be any tax put upon oleomargarine.

Mr. THOMAS. I so said.
Mr. CUMMINS. Why tax oleomargarine and not tax butter?
Mr. THOMAS. I so said in referring to the contention of the Senator from Pennsylvania, made yesterday afternoon-that it was perfectly logical. I do not believe that we should put a tax, unless absolutely necessary, upon any food product; but unless we do this we must leave the present law where it is, with all of its infirmities and all of its injustices.

Mr. CUMMINS. This could be amended so as to put a tax of 2 cents a pound on butter, and thus raise still more money than this amendment will raise.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator says we could do it. I suppose that is potentially true, but actually he knows it is impossible, even were it just.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wonder that the Senator from Alabama did not include that in his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the fact that there should be no tax at all upon this or any other product may be a good reason for opposing it; but if existing legislation regarding a subject is of such a character that some compromise is necessary in order to remedy existing evils, I am inclined to take what I can get, and await some more propitious season for going a little further.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Reed in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.
Mr. CLAPP. I have been very much interested, not only in the Senator's argument, but in the others that have been made here, and I should like to ask the Senator what justification there is for taking an article of food that is claimed to be wholesome, not deleterious—namely, uncolored oleomargarine, said to be the poor man's food—and increasing the tax on that not.

product from one-fourth of a cent to 2 cents a pound? That is what puzzles me. I can understand why it might be desired to reduce the tax on the colored oleomargarine; but why increase it on the uncolored oleomargarine?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think I will answer that question by asking another. Would the Senator vote for this bill if the tax on uncolored oleomargarine were removed en-

Mr. CLAPP. Absolutely; and I propose to offer an amendment to take the tax off of uncolored oleomargarine.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator does, I am inclined to think, speaking offhand and impulsively, that I will There is no justification for it, Mr. President. vote for it also. There is an explanation for it, and that I have attempted to What we want is to put some kind of a statute upon the books that will do reasonable justice to a legitimate industry instead of penalizing it for the benefit of another legitimate

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. CLAPP addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. CLAPP. Just a moment. Of course the Senator did not understand that I would vote to reduce the tax on colored oleo-

Mr. THOMAS. I did so understand.

Mr. CLAPP. I am in favor of taking the tax off of uncolored oleomargarine; and I can not for the life of me see any justification at this time for increasing the tax on uncolored oleomargarine from one-fourth of a cent a pound to 2 cents

Mr. THOMAS. I do not believe that the Senator can justify the removal of the tax in the one instance and vote for it in the other; I mean, from my standpoint. Of course I do not reflect upon the Senator's judgment, upon which he must rely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question as to what his good purposes would be? Would the Senator be willing to take off the tax altogether and then make a provision that no oleomargarine should be colored in imitation of butter?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I would not.
Mr. McCUMBER. And then put a penalty on the counter-

Mr. THOMAS. I would do that provided the Senator would go a step further and prohibit the coloring of white butter as

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, would he do that?

Mr. THOMAS. I would do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not the slightest objection to a prohibition against the coloring of white butter.

Mr. THOMAS. I would do that. Mr. McCUMBER. But there is one difference: When you color your white butter you do not color it and then sell it for oleomargarine. When you color your oleomargarine you color it for the very purpose of imposing it upon the public as butter; quite a little difference.

Mr. THOMAS. When you color your white butter yellow and sell it as yellow butter you get a better price for it, however, and to that extent you defraud the buyer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Where does the Senator get that informa-

Mr. THOMAS. Why, it is obvious. Why color it if that is not the purpose?

Mr. McCUMBER. Tell me just one place where the Senator gets the information that white butter, if it is pure butter, will not sell for just exactly the same as yellow butter.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I know that now it is a fad in the fashionable hotels and restaurants of the country to eat white butter. Mr. McCUMBER. Why, in the summer time you do not have any white butter.

Mr. THOMAS. I have gotten it in the summer time. Perhaps the hotels have palmed off white oleomargarine upon me. I do not know; but I do not find any difficulty in getting white butter, without salt-I have to salt it myself-in any of the hotels that I am accustomed to patronize. It is forced on me.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me get a complete answer from the Senator, if I can. To-day the butter that is manufactured is white butter. Does not that butter sell for just exactly as much as it would sell for if it were colored yellow to-day?

Mr. THOMAS. It may. Mr. McCUMBER. If it does not, show me wherein it does

Mr. THOMAS. It may, for the reason that 90 per cent of the butter is colored yellow. If, instead of coloring it, the 90 per cent that is colored were sold as white, it would not bring as large a price, and that is why it is colored.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am surprised, and I should like to get the source of the information of the Senator when he says that 90 per cent of the butter that is sold to-day

From whence does he get it?

Mr. THOMAS. My authority for that is the statement of the Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth] last night, after the Senator from North Dakota had left the Chamber and before our adjournment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do I understand that the Senator from New York stated that 90 per cent of the butter that we are using now is colored?

The Senator from New York is here to Mr. THOMAS. Yes. defend his statement, and I yield the floor to him for that purpose, if he desires it.

Why, the best Elgin butter you get to-day Mr. McCUMBER. is uncolored. The best butter of all of your creameries to-day is uncolored butter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Why certainly I will yield to the Senator Mr. THOMAS.

from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The statement of the Senator from North Dakota just at that point is rather surprising. sure that he knows, on reflection, that all through the wintertime cows that are fed on grain and hay and dry feed produce white butter, and nothing but white butter; and every piece of butter you buy in wintertime that is yellow has been colored, with the exception of butter made from the milk of cows that are fed on certain feeds which are calculated to produce color. Every piece of such butter is colored; it must be in order to have the yellow color.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, if that is the way the Senator gets his information, I can meet him immediately on the same ground. When you go into any good hotel in this city to-day, you will find white butter, and not colored.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely. That butter has not the color introduced into it, however, because the patrons of the so-called high-class and fashionable hotels prefer white butter because they believe its whiteness guarantees in some way its freshness, though it really has nothing to do with it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then that would naturally induce all of them to sell white butter, would it not? The Senator's own reasons destroy his argument.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the average person does not care to buy white butter. The commercial butter of the country is ordinarily yellow, and the average purchaser demands it the year round.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is a little bit mistaken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator will go into the grocery business and attempt to sell nothing but white butter, he will give it up within one month.

Mr. McCUMBER. If he offers white butter, he can get a better price for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire whether the Senator from Colorado is still holding the floor?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Colorado is holding the floor, but is always willing to yield it for a time to his friends upon the other side.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from New York, who is very familiar with this subject, if there is an artificial process for bleaching butter, making it white, to meet the demands of the fashionable trade?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I never have heard of it. Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I thought perhaps the Senator might have some knowledge on that subject. I do not know whether that is so or not; but I presume that if the trade demanded bleached butter they would get it, because I remember that the late Senator from Mississippi, Mr. Money, put in his testimony the statement-and it is in some of the hearings on this oleomargarine question—that the Elgin people shipped a carload of crimson butter to South America.

Mr. THOMAS. I know nothing about that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. I know personally that the ultrafashionable people of the country now want their butter white and without salt; but they form a very small part of the American people,

Mr. President, I have occupied more time than I should with regard to a subject which, as I stated at the outset, has been exhaustively presented by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from New York [Mr. Wabsworth]. Before I take my seat, however, I want to refer to one aspect or item of this bill about which I am not in accord with my associates upon the committee. I refer to the proposed taxation of mutual insurance companies.

I listened the other night with much interest to the remarks of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Sherman] on that subject; I am in full accord with his criticisms of the inclusion in this bill of mutual insurance companies among those which are to be subjected to the so-called excess profits tax. In the incometax law of 1913, exemption is made of fraternal and charitable mutual organizations, mutual savings banks, and building and loan associations. The large life and fire insurance companies were included, for reasons to which I will advert hereafter. These exemptions have been recognized, and properly so, in all succeeding revenue legislation enacted by the last two Congresses. The reasons which justify these, in my judgment, apply as fully and as forcefully to mutual insurance companies of all kinds as they do to the classes embraced in the exemption. The principle of mutual insurance companies is well stated in a decision by one of the judges of the English House of Lords in a case (L. R. 14, appeal cases, 381), where he says:

in a case (L. R. 14, appeal cases, 381), where he says:

Certain persons agree to insure their lives among themselves on the principle of mutual insurance. They take care to admit none but healthy lives. They contribute according to rates fixed by the approved tables, and they invite other persons to come and join them by insuring their lives on similar terms. The rates fixed by the tables are taken as being sufficient to provide for expenses, to meet liabilities, and to leave a margin for contingencies. What is to become of the surplus if everything goes right? The practice is to take an account every year of assets and liabilities and to give the insured the benefit of the surplus, either by way of reduction of premium or by way of addition to the sum insured. It can make no difference in principle whether the surplus is so applied or paid back in hard cash. In either case it is nothing but the return of so much of the amount contributed as may be in excess of the amount really required. I do not understand how this excess can be regarded from any point of view, or for any purpose, as gain or profit earned by the contributors. I do not understand how persons contributing to a common fund in pursuance of a scheme for their mutual benefit—having no dealings or relations with any outside body—can be said to have made a profit when they find that they have overcharged themselves, and that some portions of their contributions may be safely refunded. If a profit can be made in that way, there is a field for profitable enterprise, capable, I suppose, of indefinite expansion. indefinite expansion.

Mr. President, there is no capital invested in mutual insurance companies except the contributions of the members of the company to its common fund for the common purpose. It has no capital stock, although some companies which do have capital stock carry on, and very largely so, the system of participating insurance, as it is technically called. The principle upon which the mutual company operates is the annual assessment of its members of certain amounts of money designed to meet expenses, contingent and actual liabilities, and such incidental requirements and cost of operation as may be necessary. order to safeguard the business there is always an overcharge, which is repaid, generally at regular periods. There is no difference between the Woodmen of the World, a fraternal insurance organization, and the New York Life Insurance Co., except that one is a colossal aggregation of money and of liability incorporated under the laws of the State of New York and the other is a fraternal organization, with its signs and manuals, incorporated, possibly, but not for profit, and carrying on an identical business.

The insurance companies keep a large reserve fund, which is essential to enable them to continue solvent and meet their This requirement is a legal one; but the same requirement, legal or otherwise, is as imperative with the fraternal organization as it is with the incorporated insurance company. There is a contingent fund, however, which some of the large insurance companies keep on hand, and which is designed, as I am told, to meet possible extraordinary demands and requirements, sometimes due to a decrease in the value of their securities, sometimes to other causes. This fund is not required by law, and, I am sorry to say, has been at times improperly utilized, as was disclosed by the insurance investigation in New York of 1905.

Now, moneys earned upon that contingent fund constitute the basis of the income tax which these companies are required under the existing law to pay, but the profit which is sought to be taxed by this bill is not a profit which inheres in the mutual insurance business under any circumstances, Consequently I regard the imposition of this tax upon mutual insurance companies as a discriminating tax, since only the incorporated mutual companies are included, and also a tax levied upon their universal membership, thus decreasing the amount of money which would be returned to them for excess payments.

and which therefore can not be considered as profits, because the companies do not operate for profit.

Mr. President, it was a surprise to me at the hearings, as it may be to some Senators upon the floor, to learn of the enormous volume of the business of some of the fraternal organizations, which are exempted. The general counsel of the North-western Life Insurance Co., one of the largest insurance companies in the United States, or in any country, says that one of the fraternal organizations had $80,000,000 more insurance in force on the 31st of December, 1915, than did the North-western; and he refers to one or two others which are equally flourishing and whose business exceeds, and largely exceeds, that of the average insurance company. Under these circumstances I am unable to perceive how a mutual concern, consisting of men drawn together to accomplish some specific object, and not engaged in trade or business for profit, can be regarded as a commercial corporation whose capital or whose income is to be subjected to a profit tax.

It may be said, and I think perhaps it is true, that as the bill is drawn these companies, although expressly included within the terms of the measure, will nevertheless fall outside of it, because their incomes will not reach the required 8 per cent. If that be so, of course no particular injury will result from the operation of this statute, if it should be passed as it has been drawn. But it must not be forgotten that the surplus of a mutual insurance company, whether fire, life, or marine, whether a fraternal organization or an incorporated society, is the property of the policyholders, and is held as such for their protection, and their protection only, and can not be considered as a capital invested in the particular business

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President-

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota. Mr. CLAPP. I will ask the Senator-I think it is a proper question-if he carries any mutual life insurance?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not believe I carry anything else.

Mr. CLAPP. I carry a lot of mutual life insurance, and I never yet have been able to find an insurance man who could tell me how I had any effective interest in this so-called surplus. The attorney for the Northwestern, if the Senator from North Carolina is correct, stated before the committee that it was not intended to use that surplus for the benefit of the policyholders, but simply to keep securities at an average level. Of course, theoretically, everything in a mutual company does belong to the policyholders; but they keep an item there as to which I, as one of the policyholders, never could yet see when, how, or where my interest in it would materialize.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I did not so understand the attorney for the company. I have his testimony here, and I either asked him or I asked a gentleman representing some other company, whether the surplus belonged to the company or whether it belonged to the policyholders. While I can not turn to it readily, his reply in substance was that it belonged to the policyholders, each of whom was entitled to his proportion of it on demand.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I heard the Senator from North Carolina read, and as I recall the language he read: "We keep this surplus for the sole purpose"—I think he used those heard in the possible flucture. words-"of maintaining a certain level in the possible fluctuations of the value of the securities that we put up.'

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator is an old mutual-insurance policyholder he is, of course, familiar with the fact that at the end of the year, when he receives notice of the maturity of his premiums, he is entitled to a certain amount as dividend, which he can receive in cash, which will be applied in part payment of his next maturing premium, or which will be used for the purpose of increasing the amount of his insurance. He is given the privilege of choosing between three alternatives thus presented, and generally that comes from the surplus.

Mr. CLAPP. I beg the Senator's pardon, the surplus comes after that has been paid over.

Mr. THOMAS. The surplus, of course, is not entirely exhausted when the Senator receives that amount. Enough of it is held back to pay his widow when he shall have died.

Mr. CLAPP. I am not speaking now of the reserve; I am speaking of the surplus referred to by Mr. Barnes.

Mr. THOMAS. Then we are speaking at cross-purposes. I referred to that a few moments ago as a contingent reserve. That is the name given to it by the representative of the Equitable Co., if my memory serves me right. His explanation of that is, as I understand it, that the income tax paid under the existing law perhaps ought to be divided among the shareholders who are the policyholders, but the reason given for its withholding is that the company may at some time face a contingency of a serious character. For example, the Senator is familiar with the fall of the value of the stock of the New York

& New Haven Road a few years ago, in which presumably some of the assets of the insurance companies were invested. The change of the market value of such securities and the threatened continued lowering of their value might justify or require their sale at a loss. In that event, the contingent reserve which is withheld from the shareholders by these companies might become indispensable to the continued solvency of the company. I do not say that is so, but that is the statement or argument made to me as to why this contingent reserve or surplus was

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, of course, I think that anything in the company to which a policyholder in a mutual company is entitled, either now or in the future, ought not to be taxed. Mr. Barnes was the gentleman who made the statement. I have not found it yet.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, we do not disagree as to what the Senator refers to. I misunderstood him. I thought he was referring to the reserve.

Mr. CLAPP. Would the Senator say that the policyholders in that company could bring a suit to recover their share of what is distinctly called a surplus?

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator wants my individual opinion about it, I would say yes, offhand. I may be mistaken.

Mr. CLAPP. Then that ends my objection to it.
Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will remember that at one time the New York Legislature, at the instance of the great insurance companies, enacted a law prohibiting policyholders from instituting suits of that kind. That was one of the features of the Hughes investigation, so called, which attracted general attention.

The sins of corporations, like those of individuals, are apt to react upon them at times; and one of the reasons, in my judgment, why there is a popular demand for the inclusion of the great mutual insurance companies within the purview of this bill is because the public remembers the mismanagement of funds of these great companies during the early part of the century, and the additional fact that their officials are supposed to draw enormous salaries, as was disclosed by that investiga-tion, coming from moneys belonging to policyholders.

The fact is that these companies are large institutions existing for the purpose of carrying on business and, in the belief of many throughout the country, are making enormous profits inuring to the directors and not to the shareholders. This is probably one reason why they have been included in the incometax law and subjected very generally to State taxation. But because a company may go wrong, because its officers are guilty of malversation of duty, does not alter the general principle that the mutual benefit and liability on which these concerns are based is irreconcilable with the idea of a business prose-cuted for profit, and consequently I can not reconcile the theory of this bill with its inclusion of these concerns, especially when the charitable organizations, the fraternal organizations, the mutual savings banks, the building and loan associations, and other kindred associations, all of them designed for the same purpose, to wit, the mutual benefit of those who compose them, should be exempted. Let me add that for 10 years and more these companies have been well managed and properly conducted.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Sheppard in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, it is not the sins of the past but the condition of to-day. These companies have these large funds, which they call surplus as distinguished from reserve. I do not exactly justify taxation to correct evils; I think, strictly speaking, taxation should be only for revenue; but there is to my mind a good deal of force in the position taken by the Senator from North Carolina that they can avoid this by doing what the Senator says they ought to do with this fund.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true; and if this fund were utilized for the purpose of making enormous profits, say, in excess of 8 per cent of the amount, then there would be no valid reason for excluding them from the operation of the law. I do not know that they do it. I do not know but they do it. Their insistence before the committee, however, was that these investments were regulated by statute and had to be made in certain securities of unquestioned value, the interest upon which was far less than the 8 per cent which this law requires. Of course, if that is so, they do not have to pay any tax at all. But I quite agree with the Senator that the whole question could be obviated by a distribution of the surplus among the shareholders.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa,
Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think there is some confusion, possibly, at least in my mind, because we have not distinguished between two different classes of mutual insurance companies. There are two classes. The one agrees with its policyholder that he will pay a certain sum every year until the time comes for the execution of the contract, whether it be death or sooner, and that stipulation has in it a margin of safety; that is to say, it is a little more than would enable the company to accumulate at the time of the payment as estimated the amount which the company is required to pay. It is believed that there ought to be that margin of safety, not only to take care of se-curities that may diminish in value but to take care of a possible diminution in the rate of interest so that the securities will not accumulate the amount the company will be required to pay. Now, that is one kind of company. The New York Life Insurance Co. is an example of that kind of company.

There is another class of company which does a very large business, namely, the companies in which there is no contract for a stipulated sum every year until the payment is made, but in which the company collects an assessment when it has ascertained how much is required to maintain itself, the cost of operation, and the mortality loss, whatever it may be. They are ordinarily called assessment companies. There are a great many of them, and some good ones.

The latter company in order to facilitate its business accumulates the assessments, at least possibly one or two in advance, so that when death occurs it is not necessary to await the necessity of a collection of an assessment in order to make the payment, but can immediately make it out of an assessment previously made. To me it is perfectly clear that the latter companies ought not to be required to pay either an income tax, although they are under the ruling of the department, nor should they be compelled to pay this additional 8 per cent tax. So far as the former tax is concerned, I do not believe that they ought to be required to pay on that which is reasonably required in order to make them solvent, in order to surely enable them to carry out the agreements which they have made with their policyholders.

I would not have said this much except that I wanted it to be a premise to a question that I am utterly unable to answer

Mr. THOMAS. Then, I am sure I can not answer it. Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator from Colorado can help me in that regard. When these companies come to compute the tax the income, of course, is fixed by the law of last year. That remains in force. They therefore have their net income. They are entitled to take $5,000, I believe. Then they are entitled to take out 8 per cent upon the actual investment.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the proposed law.
Mr. CUMMINS. That is the proposed law. How, under the bill, are you going to ascertain what the actual investment is?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has anticipated the very thing that I was about to discuss.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I beg pardon. I do not want the Senator to answer it before he reaches it in the regular order of his speech.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, if he does not want to be interrupted at this point, but I am interested particularly in his discussion of the taxation of mutual insurance companies, and upon the very point of the colloquy which the Senator has been having with the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota there is some information here comprised in a few pages which gives the view of one of the leading insurance lawyers in my State on this very subject in criticism of the bill. I should like to have it read by the Secretary, if the Senator does not object, but if he

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will pardon me, I will be through in a few moments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I will wait.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will then have an opportunity. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Iowa of course is familiar with the provisions of section 202, which recites:

That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of assets other than cash at the time such assets were transferred to the corporation or partnership.

My construction of the application of this bill to mutual insurance companies is that neither of those subdivisions affects

And (3) paid-in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business.

The only thing, which, to my mind, would fall under the provisions of this law would be the word "surplus," to which the Senator from Minnesota referred a few moments ago. If it is not that, it can not be anything. There is no paid-in surplus in any other sense than that it is the surplus caused by accretions from premiums received and possibly from interest derived from their investments in securities or other property.

If it is held as a surplus for business purposes, it would, in my judgment, be subject, if it earned more than $5,000 plus the 8 per cent upon the amount, to be covered by item 3 to subdivision 3 of the section. My opinion is given with some misgiving. I have some question whether the money of a mutual insurance company, from whatever source received, so long as it is devoted to the mutual business, could be included in either of the three classifications.

Mr. President, the basis of this excess profits tax is that in these time of undue prosperity, when enormous business enter-prises are being conducted, when time is of the essence of things, and prices are secondary to the need of huge supplies, and where in consequence enormous profits are being exacted, it is no more than just that they who are receiving these large profits should contribute a very reasonable part thereof to the support of the Government. But that does not apply to the mutual insurance companies, whose rates are now what they were 10 years ago, 20 years ago, 5 years ago. These companies can not elevate their rate for risks because of the general rise in prices in everything else. They must proceed along the lines upon which the business is based; that is to say, upon the cost of insurance to those who are mutually engaged for their mutual benefit in conducting it. So there is no war profit, no unusual profit, no exorbitant or transient profit growing out of the business of mutual insurance companies. Whatever may be said of these great companies, their excess of 8 per cent, if they earn it at all, is presumably earned upon a business which has been subjected to no change, certainly not to any enhancement of prices or cost of operation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield. Mr. CUMMINS. I am not sure that I am right, but my theory is that under the bill as it is now framed, a mutual insurance company, especially of the second class which I mentioned, would be compelled to pay 8 per cent upon its net in-come without any deduction for a dividend on account of capital invested, and if that shall be the construction of the law it is very unjust.

Mr. THOMAS. I am inclined to disagree with the Senator in that construction. If he is right, then the law as applicable to insurance companies would be invalid, because there would be a clear distinction, a clear discrimination to their injury, between other corporations and insurance companies in the basis of the levy of the tax. If the Senator is right, there is another reason why, in my judgment, they should be exempted from the operation of this law. But there is still another.

We are upon the threshold of a possible, some think a probable, conflict with one of the great military nations of the earth. In the event our severance of diplomatic relations should ripen into hostilities, and hostilities be succeeded by conflict, there is at once a risk, an extraordinary risk, imposed upon these mutual insurance companies which they can not escape. If we are to have war our boys must bear the brunt if it. Many of them insured in these companies will leave their homes never to return. War has its victims always. The man who is insured, while in a better position than is the man who may not be, goes to the front only by increasing the risk to the company which holds his policy.

The agent of the New York Life Insurance Co. appearing before our committee stated that his company had risks in every army of every country, including Japan, engaged in the present conflict, and were, of course, required to pay their losses notwithstanding the extraordinary hazard which these men incurred, and which inevitably means a vast increase in the payments which must be met from the reserve fund of the

When we consider the inevitable consequences to these concerns, which must respond whenever one of the insured gives up his life for his country—and which I am told they are accustomed to do promptly upon proof of the absolute fact of death-it seems to me that this is no time to impose upon them the added burden of an enormous war tax; for upon their solvency, their ability to meet these obligations, depends the welfare, possibly the existence, of the prospective widow and orphan of an impending war.

So I think, Mr. President, so far as that feature of the bill goes, that all mutual concerns, whether large or small, whether they have sinned or are sinning, which are not engaged in any traffic consequent upon the war, whose methods of doing business have not been changed or modified or enlarged, whose rates for insurance are precisely what they were before, and whose contingent liabilities in the event of actual war are appalling, should be safeguarded, so far as national legislation can do it, and their funds protected and preserved to meet the liabilities with which they now seem certain to be confronted. Hence the doubt, if doubt there be, of our right to subject them to this tax should be resolved in their favor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connec-

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not claim recognition. I did not know the Senator from Connecticut had the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I will yield the floor as soon as I yield to the Senator from Connecticut. I promised him before the Senator from Mississippi came in that I would yield to him. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I asked the Senator from Colorado to yield during his remarks, but the Senator did not then want to be disturbed. I wanted to have a short document read. I do not, however, want to interfere with the Senator from Mississippi, if he desires the floor now to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, representing, as I do, a State that is largely engaged in dairying, and which would be materially and injuriously affected if the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] should be adopted, I feel compelled, although it is late in the session, and I know that business is pressing, to call attention to the glaring misapprehension of facts under which he labored when addressing the Senate yesterday in support of such amendment.

He stated that he was a Member of the House of Representatives when the present law relating to the taxation of oleomargarine was adopted, and professed to speak from personal knowledge of conditions as they existed at that time. was a Member of this body at that time, and my recollection of the conditions as they then existed embraces many things that seem to have escaped the attention of my friend.

It seems necessary, in order that the questions involved in this discussion be made clear, to refer briefly to the history of oleomargarine legislation. The Senator from Alabama asserted with great positiveness that the real opposition to his amendment comes from what he terms the Creamery Trust in the United States. If I understood him correctly, he asserted that the people of the United States demand the adoption of this amendment, and that it was in the interest of the people as a whole that he sought to have the present law, which imposes a tax of 10 cents per pound upon colored and one-fourth of 1 cent per pound upon the uncolored product, repealed and a straight tax of 2 cents a pound imposed upon all oleomargarine, regardless of its color.

I think the Senator from Alabama must have forgotten that from 1880 to 1886, and from that time down to 1890 and 1892, a sense of danger prevailed among the people of the country, and a strong opposition to the uncontrolled sale of oleomargarine found expression in a thousand ways. It found expression through the legislatures of no less than 32 of the States, the citizens of which represented 80 per cent of the entire population of Oleomargarine had been introduced as a new food product. It came mostly from the packing houses of Chicago. It was represented as being a valuable addition to the food products for the table—one that should be welcomed. But from the beginning it had the color and appearance of butter, the flavor of butter, and it was admitted by its producers that without such qualities it could not be sold. It was a dangerous counterfeit of the real article.

The people awoke to the fact that oleomargarine was everywhere sold not only in competition with genuine butter but as butter, and that the inhabitants of every State were being deceived and defrauded.

The manufacturers of eleomargarine were compelled to admit it the hearings of 1902 that it was wholly useless to place it upon the market unless it could be given the color and appearance of butter. I have in my hand the hearings held in 1902, when Mr. W. E. Miller, who represented the Armour Packing Co., of Kansas City, Mo., stated:

We desire to impress upon this committee that manufacturers can not exist under the Grout bill. In the first place, uncolored butterine is practically unsalable. It is unsightly and does not appeal to the eye of even the poor man.

That was substantially the position of all the manufacturers, and every effort made by them to place the article upon the market was backed by a determination to have it resemble butter in every respect and to have it sold as butter wherever that could be accomplished.

I have no quarrel with the manufacturers of oleo if they are willing to put it upon the market as oleo. No voice would be raised against such sales, provided they are made without deceit and the people are not misled; but when it is sold as and for butter it is not only a fraud upon the great dairying interests of the United States but it is also a fraud upon the great American people, and it is a fraud which they have resented. They resented it so vigorously that in 1886 they came to Congress and demanded legislation that would protect them from the imposition. When the bill of 1886 was presented in the other House, it provided for a tax of 10 cents per pound upon all classes of eleomargarine. The House reduced the rate to 5 cents per pound, but in the Senate the tax was fixed at 2 cents a pound, and in that form the bill became a law.

The law of 1886 imposed a tax and regulated the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. It required packages to be marked and branded; it prohibited the sale of packages that were not so marked and branded; and it prescribed the punishment for sales in violation of its provision. It authorized the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make regulations prescribing marks upon the packages, which might contain different amounts of eleomargarine up to 60 pounds each. But this law failed to stop the sales of colored oleomargarine as butter in the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President— Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota. Mr. CLAPP. Was not that law as drastic and far-reaching, and did it not safeguard as much against the improper or illegal sale of oleomargarine that was not branded as does the proposed amendment?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It was substantially the same, except that it permitted packages of 60 pounds in weight, whereas the Underwood amendment limits the size of packages to 10 pounds.

Yes. Mr. CLAPP.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. And if fraud could be committed by removing eleomargarine from a package 60 pounds in weight, the same fraud can be committed under this amendment by taking oleomargarine from boxes containing 10 pounds and afterwards selling it as butter. The pending amendment only differs from the law of 1886 in the provision as to the size of the packages in which eleomargarine may be sold.

Mr. CLAPP. Would not the smaller package rather tend to fraud in making it more convenient for keepers of small hotels and restaurants to buy it in the small package and take it out than in the larger package?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am inclined to think so; and I was very much gratified last night when the Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth], who was advocating this amendment, stated that it should be so amended that no package of colored oleomargarine over 1 pound in weight should be permitted.

On the question of whether the Creamery Trust is opposing this amendment or whether it is the American people who are opposing it, let me call attention to the fact that as far back as 1895 legislation was adopted absolutely prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine in New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania. Of course, those acts were held to be unconstitutional. other legislative methods were adopted by the States intended to prevent the sale of oleomargarine within their borders. Hampshire was the first, I think, to adopt the pink test; that is to say, to require the substance to be colored pink. But in 1891, five years after Congress had acted, the danger to the States became so great that Massachusetts adopted a statute prohibiting within that State the sale of oleomargarine made in imitation of yellow butter. The constitutionality of that act was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. They upheld the constitutionality of that act upon the very principle upon which the present law is based. In its opinion the court said:

Now, the real object of coloring oleomargarine so as to make it look like genuine butter is that it may appear to be what it is not, and thus induce unwary purchasers, who do not closely scrutinize the label upon the package in which it is contained, to buy it as and for butter produced from unadulterated milk, or cream from such milk. The suggestion that oleomargarine is artificially colored so as to render it more palatable and attractive can only mean that customers are deluded by such coloration into believing that they are getting genuine butter. If any one thinks that oleomargarine not artificially colored so as to cause it to look like butter is as palatable or as wholesome for purposes of food as pure butter, he is, as already observed, at liberty under the statute of Massachusetts to manufacture it in that State or to sell it there in such manner as to inform the customer of its real character. He is only forbidden to practice in such matters a fraud upon the general public. The statutes seek to suppress false pretenses and to promote fair dealing in the sale of an article of food. It compels the sale of oleomargarine for what it really is, by preventing its sale for what it is not.

What was the power that demanded the adoption of the legislation of 1902, which is the law now sought to be repealed?

Other States had followed the example of Massachusetts, and when the law of 1902 was adopted 32 States of this Union had adopted that class of legislation, and they represented 60,000,000 people, and that 60,000,000 represented 80 per cent of all the inhabitants of the United States. This vast majority of the people had given expression to their thought, their convictions, and their desire through State legislation. It was that force that came before Congress and demanded the legislation of 1902. It is that same force which now opposes the adoption of this amendment, and it is a force that must be reckoned with.

This, it seems to me, sir, is a complete reply to the position taken by the Senator from Alabama, when he insisted that the only opposition to this proposition of his and the only support that is given to the existing law came from the creamery trust, and that the great American people want the change.

In support of my contention I now call attention to the astounding fact that in 1899 out of a total of 104,000,000 pounds of oleo that were sold in that year 80 per cent of it was disposed of in the 32 States to which I have referred. I repeat that statement, that 80 per cent of all the oleo sold in the year 1899 was sold in the States which had adopted legislation providing that oleomargarine should not be sold in those States if it was made in imitation of butter; and from 75 to 100 per cent of it was sold as butter, according to the evidence taken by the committee in 1902. It was sold fraudulently by the retail dealers, impelled by the action of the manufacturers from whom they purchased it. They did not attempt very much to sell it in its natural color. Why? Its wholesomeness had been attacked throughout the country, just as it has been attacked in the Senate to-day by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane]. There existed a strong prejudice against it. They knew that they could only sell it by deception. By reason of the quick and the large profits thus secured, a system of fraud was fostered and imposed upon the people in this country. The book that I hold in my hand contains 800 pages of evidence taken by the Senate Committee on Agriculture in 1902. It teems with illustrations of the facts which I have stated. Education was too slow a process through which to induce the American public to buy oleomargarine. Counsel for the Armour Co., whom I have already quoted, was right when he said that they could not sell white oleomargarine, because nobody wanted it. But the deceit brought quick and very large returns, as I will show.

This record discloses the fact that the States were practically helpless. Although they had adopted prohibitive legislation, they were unable to protect themselves. They received little aid from the revenue officers of the Government. Driven to action, the States, through their dairy commissioners and other State officers, entered upon a campaign against the frauds which were being practiced upon their people. In New York Mr. Flanders, who was the assistant commissioner of agriculture, testified, and among other things said:

In our State it has never been sold, taking it generally—there may be isolated cases—cheaper than butter. For the last 15 years, as far as I know—and I have been looking after it—I myself bought it for butter in the city of Troy and paid 22 cents a pound. It is sold to consumers for butter and at butter prices. There is no exception to it in the State of New York.

Proceeding, he says:

Our men went into the city of New York, and if they went into a store where they were known and called for butter they got butter; but just as soon as they put on the garments of longshoremen, which they did in a great many instances, to see what the facts were, and took a basket upon their arms and bought a quarter of a pound of tea and a loaf of bread, they got oleomargarine. This is no fanciful dream; it is a fact.

That is a picture of the situation as it existed. If a man who was well dressed, who apparently knew his business, in-quired for butter, he got it; but when the masses, wage earners, came in and made small purchases, in every instance they got oleomargarine.

Mr. Blackburn, who was the dairy and food commissioner for the State of Ohio, said:

I desire to say that I have been dairy and food commissioner of the State of Ohio for about four years. In that time I have spent nearly $200,000 of the State money, and of that amount I presume 60 per cent has been spent in oleomargarine prosecutions.

Mr. Adams broke in to say:

I would like to ask you what percentage of oleomargarine, in your judgment, in the State of Ohio is sold for butter at retail stores, or finally sold upon the tables of hotels, restaurants, and boarding houses, as well as to the ordinary consumers?

Mr. Blackburn replied:

My judgment would be 75 per cent of it-

For four years he had been devoting his time to the work of investigation-

I might state the three leading hotels in the city of Columbus—the Chittenden, the Neal House, and the Southern Hotel—are now and have been for months back using oleomargarine on their tables in defiance of law.

Mr. Luther S. Kauffman, of Philadelphia, who was attorney for the Pure Food Butter Protective Association of Pennsylvania. told of his failure to induce the revenue officers of the Government to prosecute violations of the law; that he was compelled to come to Washington and appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, who directed the revenue officers to take action. He says:

In 1890, when I was retained by the butter men of Philadelphia, I found just this: That the whole city was filled with oleomargarine. We organized a detective force and sent them out, and we found that there was not a pound of oleomargarine, as far as the experience of the detectives was concerned, which was sold as oleomargarine. Everything was sold as and for pure butter, at pure-butter prices, in unmarked packages.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Sheppard in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.
Mr. CLAPP. All that was under the flat 2-cent tax on colored and uncolored oleomargarine alike?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Every instance of it; and that is just the condition, in my judgment, that we shall have if the Underwood amendment is adopted.

Mr. Kauffman further says:

Mr. Kauffman further says:

I went to the revenue authorities in 1891 and I called their attention to section 6 of that law. There never had been in the eastern district of Pennsylvania any prosecution by the revenue authorities for violation of that act, although it had been in existence for four years. We presented a lot of evidence of violations of that United States law to the revenue officers, and they absolutely refused to swear out the warrants. I was compelled to come over to the Secretary of the Treasury, at that time the Hon. Charles Foster, of Ohio; we had to summon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before us; and we compelled the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of issue orders to the revenue agents in Philadelphia that evidence should be received and the warrants sworn out. They did not do it until we did that very thing. Then, when the evidence was submitted, the officers performed their duty, and we convicted and sent to jail the men against whom we brought the evidence; and that stopped the illegal traffic in the city of Philadelphia. We drove the retailers out of the business. We created the office of dairy and food commissioner of the State of Pennsylvania in 1893, and then that association, at that day, went out of business, because this department had been created to accomplish the same end.

He says, again:

He says, again:

We found again, in February of 1899, with this same United States law still in force, not a dealer in oleomargarine in the city of Philadelphia but who was selling oleomargarine as and for butter; and the detectives went out and paid butter prices for it, paying as high as 40 cents a pound for oleomargarine bought as butter. I have the cases

At that point he brought in a tabulated statement, and said:

At that point he brought in a tabulated statement, and said:

There is the list of cases, with the date of purchase and the name and address of the party. These are purchases made during that time by this association. There they are, right straight along, page after page—more than 500 cases of purchases of oleomargarine in the city of Philadelphia. I am going to give you a summary of them. There are in this list more than 500 cases of purchases of oleomargarine in the city of Philadelphia. The detectives in every single case, without exception, asked for butter, and they got oleomargarine at butter prices without any indication from the seller that it was oleomargarine. There you have a fraud directly upon the purchaser.

Now, let me give you a summary of these cases. How many were marked? There are 508 cases here. I have the details there. I am not talking about supposititious cases. Every case is there, with the name and date and the result. These detectives went into these places, places kept by men who were supposed to be selling oleomargarine and who had paid revenue taxes. They asked for butter.

Now, mark the result. The witness says:

Now, mark the result. The witness says: Of those 508 purchases, 49 were butter and 459 were oleomarkarine. And yet he says that in every case butter was asked for when the agent made the purchase.

I might go on indefinitely reading extracts of that kind, but time forbids.

John Hamilton, who was secretary of agriculture for Pennsylvania-he was not representing any creamery association-

We have had a great deal of experience in Pennsylvania with this article and a large amount of it is not branded, although it may be sold for butter. We have examined more than 1,000 samples this year, and a large percentage of it is not branded so as to distinguish it from butter, and is sold as butter.

Right here in the city of Washington Mr. Knight testified as to the conditions. He said:

Mr. Knight. Formerly they had the words "Swift's Jersey," and such words as that; but when the ruling was made that they should put the word 'oleomargarine' on if they had any printing, immediately everything dropped off. I made a search of this town, in company with a Representative from Nebraska, Representative Haugen, of lowa; and Representative Dahle, of Wisconsin, and we searched every place to find a package of oleomargarine in parchment paper that had any printing on it at all, and we falled to find one in the city. Senator Heiffeld, of course, if anyone were looking out for it he could find it very nicely in this sign above the stand.

Mr. Knight. That may be—in the Center Market.

Senator Heiffeld, If anybody desired to avoid buying it he could see that sign; or if anybody wanted it very bad he could see it.

Mr. Knight. It is just as likely to be butterine on the butter side, though. I want to tell you an experience I had in the house of this man who is promoting this National or Standard Butterine Co. here. We called in there and asked him if he had any of Swift's Jersey Butterine. He said he had. I said, "Let me see a package, please." He brought out a package which was absolutely plain. I said, "Is this Swift's Jersey Butterine?" He said, "It is." I said, "But I am accustomed to seeing it. I am quite familiar with the brand." He took me for a dealer, from the knowledge I displayed of the different brands of oleomargarine, and he said, "Well, I will tell you; according to a new rule that has been issued by the Internal-Revenue Department, if they put anything on they must put on the word 'oleomargarine,' don't you see, so you would have the word 'oleomargarine' on it if there was anything printed on it at all:" and he is now promoting a million-dollar plant for manufacturing butterine in the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, I have read these extracts showing how it was in Washington, how it was in Philadelphia, how it was in New York, and in one or two of our other large cities, but I have omitted a great mass of evidence that showed that the conditions existing in these cities existed everywhere in the United The law of 1886, as the Senator from Minnesota has said, is almost precisely the same as the Underwood amendment, simply allowing larger packages to be issued than the Underwood amendment does. It was under that law that these frauds were committed, and it was under that law that frauds were committed to such an extent that 32 States of the Union, representing 80 per cent of the population of this country, protested against it and demanded the color test which adopted in 1902 and which this amendment seeks to repeal.

I recall in my own personal experience incidents which fur-ther emphasize what I have said. For a great many years I have represented this body as a visitor to the National Reform School just outside this city. In 1902 I visited the school in company with Col. Cecil Clay, of the Department of Justice, who was very much interested in the institution, and we were discussing this question. Incidentally the superintendent told us he had made two purchases the day before, one of oleomargarine and the other of butter; that for the oleomargarine he had paid 14 cents a pound, and for the butter he had paid 23 cents a pound. We caused both purchases to be sent out for analysis, and both proved to be oleomargarine. Even the United States was being defrauded by these rascals whose successors now want to repeal the existing law, a law which satisfies the

I have wondered why no petitions have been presented on the part of the people, if as alleged they want a repeal of this I challenge any man in this body to produce a petition from any of the States that suffered in the way I have indicated asking for a repeal of this law, or indicating that there is any desire on the part of the masses of the people for a repeal of the There is, in fact, no demand for it.

Where does the demand come from? It comes from just the same sources that opposition to honest dealing has always come from—first, from the great corporations that are producing this substance and want to make exorbitant profit from it, backed, as appears by the brief that has been presented by the Senator from Alabama in support of his proposition, by the Interstate Cottonseed Crushers' Association and the American National Live Stock Association. I may say that in 1902, when attorneys appeared here professing to represent the cattlemen's association, the then Senator from Kansas, who was engaged in cattle raising, stood in his place and said that he did not demand it and did not want it.

It has been alleged in this debate, however—I understood my friend from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] yesterday to assert—that these frauds to which I have referred were not committed by the manufacturers, but that it was only when this product got into the hands of the retailers and they saw the opportunity to make a great profit that fraud was practiced by purchasing the uncolored product, coloring it, and selling it as butter. This was claimed 15 years ago just as it is claimed to-day. The manufacturers stood back and said: "We are not in it. If there has been any fraud it has been committed by others. that is so, I want to know why it was that they were all sailing under false colors.

I found in existence at that time the "Vermont Manufacturing Co.," making oleomargarine. I made inquiries and found that they were located in the State of Rhode Island. Why did they put on their product the name "Vermont"? Why, sir, Vermont at that time stood preeminent as a dairying State; not so preeminent as she does to-day, because the last census shows that during the last 10 census years Vermont was making more butter per capita than any other State in the Union; she was making more butter per farm than any other State in the Union; and, what is more significant, she was making more butter per cow than any other State in the Union, showing that we have the finest herds, that we are treating them in a scientific, intelligent manner, and that we are bringing the art of butter making to a high standard, just as they are in Wisconsin and other dairying States. So these manufacturers of this spurious article adopted, when they began making oleomargarine in the State of Rhode Island, the name of the Vermont Manufacturing Co. Then we had the Capital City Dairy Co., with its manufactory in the State of Ohio; we had the Union Dairy Co.; the Lake-side Creamery; the Cold Spring Creamery; and the Swift's Jersey. I pick out these names at random from the corporations that were selling this stuff to the people of the United States as butter. The fraud began at the head of the business, but the manufacturer, the producer, and the wholesaler joined in masquerading. It also appears in the hearings that the representative of one of the great packing houses in Chicago went so far as to assert that oleo is butter. Mr. LANE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. DILLINGHAM, I do.

Mr. LANE. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there is published a pamphlet called "The Butter Industry in the United States," by Edward Wheaton, Ph. D., under date of 1916, in which he says that in high-class oleomargarine out of 3571 pounds they had 95 pounds of butter, process butter, in my opinion, I think without question, and giving some of the other formula of a cheaper grade, they used of milk 280 pounds out of 1,496½ pounds to give it a flavor, and a better view, if you please.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Exactly.

Mr. LANE. And his criticism of butter is for the reason that it contains tubercular germs. They are using, I assume, not the best quality of butter, but the cheapest quality of process butter and milk, which contain the most tubercular germs.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am much obliged to the Senator from Oregon for the information he has communicated to the Senate. It simply goes to show that the product of these manufacturers, unless it has butter in it or cream added to it, never could be placed on the market. They have to add to it that which gives it the flavor, which brings into it an element of butter, and it then goes out to the country under the law or against the law as a counterfeit of butter. It is utterly impossible when you have counterfeits upon the market to avoid frauds upon the public.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I suggest to the Senator that even when the manufacturer did not commit a fraud there might be a fraud on the part of the retailer.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. There was, undoubtedly; and they were encouraged to it, as I shall show the Senator before I conclude, by the manufacturer.

I find that in 1890 the manufactories had increased to 30. There were 186 wholesale dealers and 2,500 retailers in the city of Chicago, 10,000 retailers in the United States, and 80 per cent of all that was sold in the States that had legislated against it, and sold to the American people, who had spoken against such frauds through their legislatures. At that time the record shows that William J. Moxley, I think of Chicago, produced 121 per cent of all the oleo produced in the United States. Under date of Chicago, April 5, 1899, he sent out a notice to the trade which read as follows:

CHICAGO, April 5, 1899.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.

Inclosed find a color card, which is as near the color of our butterine as the printer's art can represent. Our aim in sending you this card is to aid you in selecting the proper color suitable to your trade. Mistakes are easily made, but hard to remedy.

Now, mark what more he says:

Now, mark what more he says:

In nearly every section of the country there is a difference in the color of butter, and even in certain seasons of the year there is a change, as you will have noticed. In winter butter is of a lighter color than in summer. In many sections this is the result of the difference in feed or pasture.

We can give you just what you want at all seasons if we know your requirements. As an example, No. 1 has no coloring matter, No. 2 a little coloring, and so on to No. 8, which is the highest-colored goods we turn out. Preserve this card, order the color you want by number, and we will send you just what you want.

Yours, truly,

What we will send you go in 1800, 19 on 12 years effect the set

That, mark you, was in 1899, 12 or 13 years after the act of 1886 was passed, but immediately preceding the legislation of 1902. So much of that work was done that the dairy union of Illinois sent out notices to the retail trade that they would be prosecuted and, they hoped, convicted. In reply to that the same Mr. Moxley, the manufacturer, sent out a letter which told the retail dealers that he would stand back of them, and in many instances he did so, at large expense.

Let us again return to Washington. Mr. Walter E. Wilkins in 1902 was president of the Standard Butterine Co. of this city; Joseph Wilkins and Howard Butler were, as I now remember, his clerks. They were detected by the Government officers, according to the testimony of the Internal-Revenue Department, in removing marks of identification and revenue stamps from a carload of oleo in the station at Philadelphia. It was shipped in 60-pound packages. It can be done with a 10-pound package just as well, and in many instances probably better, as has been suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clapp]. But they were detected. Mr. Joseph Wilkins was convicted and sentenced. A pardon was sought of President McKinley, and the opinion of the Attorney General, Mr. Griggs, is given in this volume, where he recommends that the pardon be not granted because of the man's guilt. I will not stop to read it. his indictment by the Federal grand jury, and after the business was thus broken up, he was employed by Braun & Fitts, to whom I have before referred as large manufacturers of oleo in Chicago, as a director of salesmen of oleomargarine.

Are there not some manufacturers back of this movement? Do they not entertain the thought that has been in the minds of their predecessors ever since they put this article upon the Is it not the thought which has actuated all of them in all their actions in every contest in every State of the Union and in every contest that has been had in the Congress of the United States over this question? Why should they not be interested when the profits involved are considered? When oleomargarine is counterfeited in imitation of butter the profits are immense.

I hold in my hand a copy of a prospectus of the Standard Butterine Co., incorporated under the laws of the State of West Virginia, United States of America, capital stock $1,000,000. Standard Butterine Co., W. P. Wilkins, president; offices, 208 Ninth Street NW., Washington, D. C., United States of America, September 1, 1900. That was issued within two years of the time when the existing law was passed. In this prospectus Mr. Wilkins is asking for subscriptions to stock. I will read the ingredients. He says:

TABLE OF COST AND PROFITS.

It is perhaps best to add to this prospectus a statement of the exact cost of and profits in the manufacture of butterine, compiled from manufacturing statistics and recent market quotations.

Cost, showing proportions used for each 100 pounds.

Oleo oil, 32 pounds, at 9½ cents per pound
Neutral lard, 17 pounds, at 8½ cents per pound
Cotton oil, 17 pounds, at 5 cents per pound
Milk, 17 pounds, at 1 cent per pound
Salt, 7 pounds, at one-half cent per pound . 17

That made a cost for a hundred pounds of oleo $8.92. In this prospectus he further sets out that the difference between the manufacture and the selling price of that brand of oleo was $4.08 a hundred.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was pretty cheap milk.
Mr. DILLINGHAM. It was pretty cheap milk and a pretty cheap compound; but he was asking subscription for stock to a company that was doing business under the name of a butterine factory, and sending out a prospectus showing that they made a profit of $4.08 on every hundred pounds that they produced.

Mr. STERLING. The butterine was actually oleomargarine?
Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not know because his company was called the Butterine Co., but I have given the ingredients.
Mr. STERLING. I judge from the ingredients that it might well be called oleomargarine.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I thought so. He says, further:

The preferred stock is guaranteed to pay 8 per cent per annum, and the common stock ought, by conservative estimate, to pay at least 15 per cent after the first year of business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When did this occur?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In 1900, two years before the passage of the present law. This same Mr. Wilkins, as late as 1901, writes from this city to a gentleman in Iowa, saying:

WILKINS & Co., INCORPORATED, 208 Ninth Street NW., Washington, D. C., November 8, 1901.

PRESIDENT IOWA AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, Ames, Iowa.

Dear Sin: Good butter is getting scarce and the demand for our butterine is increasing. Why? Simply because we are handling the very best goods to be found on the market—a substitute for butter that can not be detected.

That was the condition which existed when the present law was passed. The public was the subject of fraud and deceit on the part of every producer who saw fit to establish himself in this unholy business.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont why it is that of all the frauds practiced under the law of 1886, substantially the same as the law proposed to be enacted here, the Treasury Department of the United States, including the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are favoring the present law?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have only my own private opinion upon that subject. It makes an enormous amount of work to ferret out these individual frauds and follow the practices of the retailers and ascertain what they are doing. I have already called attention, if the Senator pleases, to the testimony of one who came to Washington to induce the department to take action. He could not induce the revenue officers in the city of his residence to act and he came here and applied to Secretary Foster for assistance. They called in the commissioner and went over the matter, and orders were issued and the desired help was secured. I think the inaction was induced by the difficulties in the way, and that inefficiency resulted. I am sorry to say that, but I can not reach any other conclusion.

I can not too often repeat that the law under which these frauds were committed was substantially the same as the Underwood amendment, and if these frauds were successful under that law they certainly can be committed under the proposed amendment.

The law of 1902 has been upon the statute books for 15 years. Outside the circle of manufacturers of oleomargarine, who has demanded the proposed changes? Has any State legislature repealed the statute forbidding the sale of oleomargarine when colored in imitation of butter? Has any dairymen's association or any organization of farmers or any grange, State or National, demanded the change? Have the purchasing classes in our great cities demanded any change in the Government If so, it has escaped my attention; I very frankly assert that if this great organization of manufacturers desires a change it should be sought through an independent bill; it should be referred to the appropriate committee, that hearings can be had, that we may be able to determine precisely what conditions prevail in the cities of the United States at the present time. I should like to have the fact appear that the people of the United States are so well satisfied with the present law that they rested quietly and contentedly until they heard of this movement, and that they then rose up en masse and demanded that it be defeated.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator was asking if anybody outside of certain group had found fault with the law. I wish to say to the Senator that four or five years ago a man who employs a great many men did make complaint to me in regard to the law. I asked him what was his objection to it. I said you do not have to pay the tax, you can buy the uncolored product. He said, "Our men would know the difference."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. So it is. We are facing a strange situation, Mr. President. This law has been upon our statute books for 15 years, the whole country has seemed to be perfectly contented with it. The dairymen are not complaining of it, the creameries are not complaining about it, the consumers are not complaining of it. The masses are satisfied with it. In 1902 the manufacturers were here demanding the Wadsworth substitute, and this amendment is substantially the Wadsworth bill, except that it limits the size of the packages to 10 pounds of oleomargarine.

What the manufacturers were demanding 15 years ago, against the voice of the people, they are here to-day demanding against the voice of the people. Now, as then, they are employing the same agencies, the producers of cotton-seed oil and the cattle growers' association, which at that time was represented by Judge Springer, and very ably too. So to-day we have the same influences operating in favor of the proposed amendment that were active 15 years ago in demanding the substitute bill and opposing the legislation now on the statute

Mr. President, I have desired to recall the history of oleomargarine legislation and to disclose, as far as I have been able to do, the fact that the country is satisfied with the existing law, and that this is a selfish interest backing the proposed amendment. It is the interest that originated with the production of oleomargarine, that forced it upon the objecting States under the law of 1886, and that wants again to have unlimited power to impose it upon the country under the guise of butter, with a tax of only 2 cents per pound upon it.

Upon us rests the responsibility of representing the people of 48 States. It is our duty to deal fairly with every interest, the manufacturers of oleomargarine as well as the great public. I am perfectly willing that, having made it wholesome, they have accorded them a full opportunity to sell it for what it is. Let every man in the country have the opportunity to buy it for what it is and to pay precisely what it is worth, and no more. On the other hand, we must consider the great dairy interests of the country, the importance of which can hardly be measured. Doubtless I feel more interested in the proposed change than I should otherwise do, because in the great revolution in industrial conditions which followed the Citi Wen. lution in industrial conditions which followed the Civil War the agriculture of the East suffered enormously from the opening up of the broad and teeming acres of the West. The people of the East were slow to recognize the changed conditions, and in Vermont, which is essentially an agricultural State, with good pastures and rich meadows, the values of farm lands gradually decreased as a result of competition until in 1900 they were 20 per cent less in value than in 1870.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Vermont yield to his colleague?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask my colleague if it is not true that the general condition of Vermont farming has been materially improved by the vast increase made in the dairying

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was coming to that. that the values of farm lands had decreased in Vermont; and here in this Chamber I heard it charged in debate that the farms in Vermont were being deserted, though that was not true. But since the close of the Civil War New England has had a remarkable growth in her manufacturing industries, and our farmers at last woke up to the fact that they could no longer compete with the West in the cereals or in the production of beef cattle, and, perhaps, in some other products, but they also realized that they had at their command a largely increased and nearby market, and that, if they would profitably conduct their farms, they must specialize; that they must produce the goods demanded by such market. As a result, they gradually changed their methods and entered extensively into the production of fruits and vegetables, poultry and eggs; but their crowning achievement was in the development of dairy interests. In the last 15 years there has been a real revolution in the agricultural and dairy industries in that State.

You may ride the length and breadth of Vermont to-day and you will hardly find a set of farm buildings that are not trim and clean, with surroundings which indicate a high degree of prosperity. New stables abound everywhere, with cement cellars and silos, every shred of fertilizing material is saved and goes back to the land, and the value of crops has multiplied. The finest herds of cattle have been introduced—some of them Jerseys, some Ayrshires, some Guernseys, and some Holsteins. On every farm in Vermont to-day you will find high-bred stock, and on many of them thoroughbreds. Associations of farmers and dairymen are found in almost every town, as well as in the counties and in the State. Milking contests are common in every community, and every herdsman is proud when he can come into the record with a cow that is giving a larger proportion of butter fat within a given time than those of his neigh-

These classes have studied all the systems of cattle feeding, and have tested all classes of rations; they have studied the best systems of manufacturing and of marketing their products. The result of this revolution has been that in the 10 census years between 1900 and 1910 the farm values in Vermont increased

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And they have also invited careful inspection.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The owners have invited inspection of their cattle. A man who has in his herd a tuberculous cow is in disgrace until it has been eliminated. If he has any reason to suspect that an infected cow is in his herd, the State commissioner is summoned, the test is made, and if the cow is found to be tuberculous, she is at once killed, and the State comes to his aid in meeting the loss. The State has adopted the most vigorous measures to stamp out disease, in all of which the owners are in sympathy.

But my friend from Alabama spoke about the "Creamery Trust," and asserted that the opposition to the adoption of the amendment was confined to that alleged combination. Are not the individual dairymen interested? From the Statistical Abstract I find that in 1909, when the last census was taken, there were manufactured upon the farms of the United States 994,000,000 pounds of butter and in the creameries of the United States there were manufactured only 624,000,000 pounds, a third more on the farms than in the creameries; and it appears also that in all of the great West most of the creameries are conducted upon the cooperative plan, while in the East the same is true to a greater or less degree. I have before me a full list of the States, with the amount of the butter pro-duced upon the farm and in the creameries of each, but it is too long to reproduce at this time.

Mr. President, I have little to add to what I have already said. I believe not only that the State which I in part represent is unanimously opposed to this legislation, but I believe that 75 per cent or more of the people of the United States are opposed to it. This must be so, if we are to measure our judgment by the action of the individual States in their legislation upon the subject.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER, Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.
Mr. STERLING. There is one question which I think the Senator from Vermont has not discussed and which I should like to ask his views upon. It has been urged here that the cost of living will be reduced under the operation of the Underwood amendment, and that thereby a large class of people in the United States will be benefited. I should like to have the Senator's views on that proposition.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I have examined the record under the law of 1886, and I could find no cases where oleo was sold in the colored state at a price lower than that of butter. I looked through the reported testimony carefully-there may have been instances which escaped my eye-but in every instance I discovered it was found that the oleo which was colored was sold as butter and sold at butter prices.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the mont yield to the Senator from Michigan? Does the Senator from Ver-

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to ask a question of the Senator before he sits down, on the point raised by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Sterling], and that is, if oleomargarine is sold for what it is, it must of necessity be at a much less price to the consumer than it would be sold in imitation of butter, and if there is any question of economy in the cost of living, the person who desires to use a harmless and acceptable food, such as oleomargarine is admitted to be, would be able to buy it at much less than he could otherwise buy it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That was perfectly evident. existing law, which imposes a tax of only one-fourth of 1 cent a pound on the uncolored oleo, the article can be placed on the market for just what it is. It can be advertised, as Ivory soap is advertised, as being 100 per cent pure. If the people want it, they can get it at the price which it ought to bear. The present law is all in the interest of the people. If they want oleo, they can get it. That, however, is not what these manufacturers want. They want the privilege of putting it on the market colored as butter, simply to have it sold as butter and to secure the immense profits which they enjoyed prior to 1902, when the present law was enacted.

For the reasons stated, Mr. President, I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LEE of Maryland obtained the floor.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, before my colleague sits down I desire to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland has been recognized.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I yield to the Senator. Mr. PAGE. The question I desire to ask has been suggested the remark of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. What will be the effect of this proposed law upon the price of oleomargarine? To-day, in round numbers, the price, as I understand, is 20 cents a pound approximately for oleomargarine and 40 cents for butter. If oleomargarine can be made and sold as butter, is it not probably true that instead of bringing 20 cents a pound its quality will be improved until the price of eleomargarine will go up to 25 cents, and the more they improve it the higher its cost will be, of course, and the higher its price will be. It seems to me that if butter is sold at 40 cents, and the natural market for butter is interfered with by improving oleomargarine, the natural consequence will be the reduction in the price of butter, and the two articles will come nearer and nearer together in price, although not quite reaching the same level, of course. But it will stimulate the manufac-ture of oleomargarine and will materially interfere with the manufacture of butter and the price of butter.

It seems to me that it is an attack upon the butter industry that can hardly be overestimated, and I was very sorry to hear the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] say that if he thought the change of the law would interfere with the dairy industry he would not favor it. When he said that I thought he must be mistaken, or had not given consideration to the facts that I have mentioned in regard to the influence of oleomargarine upon the price of butter and the price of butter upon oleomargarine. It seems to me that there can be but one answer to the question propounded to my colleague by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, this morning, according to its custom, the Senate listened to the reading of the Farewell Address of Gen. Washington to the people of the United States, dated the 17th of September, 1796. Now, for a brief moment, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what might be properly called the farewell address of Gen. Washington to the Senate and House of Representatives in joint session, dated nearly three months later than the farewell address to the people of the United States, and which farewell address to the Senate and House of Representatives is particularly apposite at the present time, because it deals exclusively with the question of the national defense.

For another reason, Mr. President, this farewell address, dated December 7, 1796, is appropriate to be read here to-day, in the closing days of the first and only Congress, I may say, that has made any reasonable effort to place the militia of the United States on an efficient basis, or, as the Father of his Country expressed it, "on an efficient establishment."

This Congress passed a law on the 3d of June, 1916, correcting omissions and defects in the previous militia law of 1903 and increasing the appropriation for the militia establishment from an average annual appropriation of $6,000,000 to the present annual appropriation of over $50,000,000. These farewell words of Gen. Washington to the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives are the concluding part of his speech to both Houses on December 7, 1796, and are as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives, my solicitude to see the militia of the United States placed on an efficient establishment has been so often and so ardently expressed that I shall but barely recall the subject to your view on the present occasion, at the same time that I shall submit to your inquiry whether our harbors the same time that I shall submit to your inquiry waters are yet sufficiently secured.

The situation in which I now stand, for the last time, in the midst of the Representatives of the people of the United States naturally recalls the period when the administration of the present form of government commenced; and I can not omit the occasion to congratulate you and my country on the success of the experiment nor to repeat my fervent supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe and Sovereign Arbiter of Nations that His providential care may still be extended to the United States; that the virtue and happiness of the people may be preserved; and that the Government which they have instituted for the protection of their liberties may be perpetual.

George Washington.

Returning now, Mr. President, to the bill before the Senate more especially, I want to call attention to that portion of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] with reference to a report from the Department of Agriculture in 1912, which he cited as showing the dangerous qualities of 61 per cent of the creamery products of the country. heard the Senator refer to the report of 1912, without knowing anything about it, it struck me that he was producing rather an old sample of butter—5 years old, to say the least—and I questioned the application of his figures, especially in view of the fact that it is well known that in the last five years enormous improvements have been made with reference to the health conditions of dairy cattle, the elimination of tuberculosis, and the handling of dairy products. While the debate was going on I communicated with the Department of Agriculture and secured a letter on this subject, which is a circular letter written by Assistant Secretary Carl Vrooman, and bearing date July 27, 1916, which seems to show very conclusively that the figures adduced by the Senator from Alabama can hardly be considered by the Senate as conclusive on this subject. Briefly speaking, Mr. President, the report to which the Senator referred was based on an investigation of but 144 creameries and cream-buying establishments out of a total of 46,000 creameries and cream-buying establishments. This very small percentage of these establishments—144 out of 46,000—was relied upon here to give us a percentage condemning 61 per cent of the dairy products of the country; and almost certainly, Mr. President, the parties making those investigations selected the most objectionable establishments.

I am going to ask that this whole letter of Assistant Secretary

Vrooman be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY, Washington, July 27, 1916.

Mx Dear Sir: Your letter of June 14, with reference to House resolution 137, popularly known as the Linthicum resolution, is at hand. I agree with you that it is decidedly unfortunate that the report referred to in this resolution is being made use of without more resolution 137, popularly known as the Linthicum resolution, is at hand. I agree with you that it is decidedly unfortunate that the report referred to in this resolution is being made use of without more adequate explantions.

To begin with, this report was based upon an investigation made by the Bureau of Animal Industry over four years ago; the investigation having been begun on April 10 and having ended June 30, 1912, before either Secretary Houston or I became connected with the Department of Agriculture. Furthermore, the report itself was based on an investigation of but 144 creameries and cream-buying stations out of a total of 6,000 creameries and some 40,000 cream-buying stations.

The Federal Department of Agriculture is completely out of sympathy with current misunderstandings and misinterpretations of the 1912 report. That report does not mean to say or to infer that the dairy industry is on a lower level or has lower standards of purity and cleanliness than the other industries of the country. If the department were to make out a score card for the different foods and drinks that are being produced and consumed throughout this country to-day, and especially for the vegetables, fruits, and other foods exposed for sale at the average market and grocery store, it would find that in a majority of cases similar conditions exist to those disclosed in the dairy industry. In other words, it would be shown: First, that ideal conditions do not exist; secondly, that existing conditions can be greatly improved; and, thirdly, that the improvements recommended are commercially feasible. These are the three points that the Department of Agriculture attempted to bring out in its 1912 creamery report, and any attempt to rend other meanings into that report, any attempt to discredit the dairy industry, is an attempt that the Federal Department of Agriculture does not sympathize with and will have no part in.

Moreover, a lot of work has been done by the Federal Department of Agriculture does not sympathize with and w

CARL VROOMAN, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. In conclusion, Mr. President, I do not regard this as the proper time to take up the question of improving the dairy products or of regulating the color of margarin on an urgent revenue measure, and thus possibly endangering the passage of this great revenue law by introducing a controversy between the peanut and the cow, or, if it is more serious than that, between the products of different sections of a great country. There is, in fact, no proposition before the Senate to improve the purity of dairy products, nor is there remaining time in this session for so large a question.

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion, Mr. President, that this amendment, if it has any effect, by permitting the coloring of this product, margarin, to make it look more and more like butter, permitting it to be sold as such by permitting the coloring, will simply add to the price of this food product to the average man throughout the country, who otherwise might get and use the uncolored margarin at a cheaper rate. This is ertainly not the time, Mr. President, to pass legislation here that increases the price to the consumer of food of any kind.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Lee] has referred to Washington's Farewell Address; and it has been read in the Senate to-day, as has been the custom for many years. Senators have been favored with a single copy of this address. It must be in type, and it must be available. At a time like this, when we are confronted with serious international complications, and when the advice of the Father of his Country is needed more than at any other time in its history, I think it would be appropriate to print some extra copies of this farewell address.

I therefore ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution which I will prepare that a million copies of this address may be printed and that they be assigned to the Members and Members elect of the House and Senate for distribu-

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he will accept an amendment to his proposition, including the short farewell address to the Senate and House?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I will accept the amendment. Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this is a very patriotic request, but there is a sort of an understanding here in the Senate-there has been all through the session-that requests of this kind should be referred to the Committee on Printing. I do not think the Senator from Michigan can fairly object to having the request referred to the Committee on Printing, and I move its reference to that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I simply desire to insure a renewed circulation of this marvelous address, which is so timely. I am quite content to let the committee pass upon it, but I hope there will be a prompt and favorable report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion of the Senator from Michigan will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was reduced to writing and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Senate resolution 371.

Ordered, That 1,000,000 copies of Washington's Farewell Address to the people of the United States and his farewell address to the two Houses of Congress be printed in one document, for distribution by Senators.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate. So much reference has been made to the sanitary conditions of dairies that I am going to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in connection with this discussion, some copies of letters from colleges of agriculture and other special institutions setting forth the sanitary conditions of dairies in the United States as presented by men having charge of the business in the leading dairy States. I will ask to have them printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Dear Prof. McKay: I have your letter with one inclosed from E. B. Higley & Co., of Mason City, Iowa. We have a good man to recommend, and I will write at once to that effect.

In reply to your comments in regard to Chief Rawl's report on the conditions of creamerles in this country, I wish he or anyone else who is inclined to judge the entire business by the condition of a few factories could see the 125 letters I have received during the past two weeks from butter makers operating creameries in this State. These, I think, would convince anyone that the creamery business, as a rule, is one in which the factory operators take a great deal of pride and are enthusiastic in keeping themselves informed of all the latest suggestions concerning the improvement of the butter made in the establishment where they are working.

These letters, of course, represent only about 15 per cent of the creameries in this State, but they are well written, and the writers make intelligent answers to some questions I asked them about their practice and experience with pasteurizing cream for butter making. The replies are certainly an interesting collection of evidence on this subject and show conclusively that the men working in creameries are not simply mechanics but do some thinking of their own and have a high ambition to learn more and make better butter each year they work in the creamery.

You, of course, know as well as I that it is very easy for anyone to make startling statements about anything, and if it would do any good to condemn the creamery business in a wholesale way, I should be in favor of it, but it is my opinion that this is one of the worst things that can be done if anyone has a desire to help along the good cause. It is a good deal like saying that because we have a certain number of criminals in our State's prison, the entire population of the United States is of the same type.

The name of our dairy and food commissioner is Mr. George J. Weigle, but I presume Mr. Meyer can gi PORTLAND, OREG., March 23, 1916.

Mr. WM. T. CREASY,

Secretary National Dairy Union, Catawissa, Pa.

DEAR SIR: This is to acknowledge receipt of your favor of March 18, inclosing a copy of House resolution No. 137, introduced into the House of Representatives February 11, 1916.

This resolution grossly misrepresents the actual condition existing at this time in the State of Oregon. I do not know of a single creamery in this State at this time that can be declared to be in an insanitary condition. I also deny the statement that 61.5 per cent of the cream used in the State of Oregon is unclean or decomposed, or both, unless that cream which has begun to sour, or is sour, might be deemed to be decomposed.

We have no accurate data as to the amount of cream that is pasteurized in this State at the present time. However, I am of the opinion that some 50 per cent of our creameries are pasteurizing.

The statement that a large percentage of the dairy cattle are affected with tuberculosis is not true with reference to the dairy cows of Oregon. In one district of the State 600 head were tested and less than 3 per cent of tubercular cows were found. Through the year 1915 some 1,200 head were tested in various districts of the State with less than 4 per cent of reactions found, and in several counties of the State of Oregon there has been no tuberculosis found to exist.

I regret that any person should so grossly misrepresent conditions relative to the conduct and conditions of one of the greatest industries of the State, and I esteem it a privilege as Dairy and Food Commissioner of the State of Oregon to refute the statements made in House resolution No. 137, in so far as they reflect upon the dairy industry of the State of Oregon.

Mr. WM. T. CREASY,

Secretary National Dairy Union, Catawissa, Pa.

My Dear Sir: Your favor of the 18th instant has been received and I note the Linthieum resolution which was introduced in Congress recently. As I understand it the data was based on figures presented in a report by the Bureau of Animal Industry that was compiled some five or more years ago. For Kentucky, I can say that the dairles are unusually clean and the cows are healthy. The dairles that sell milk and cream to city patrons are, as a rule, cleaner here than elsewhere in this country, thanks to a rigid system of inspection enforced by the health officers of the State.

The dealers in the cities are pasteurizing the milk and cream, and I do not believe that there is any great danger of a spread of tuberculosis through the dairy products.

I believe that the figures are very largely exaggerated, and that Representative Linthicum need not worry himself or Congress unduly about the matter, because the health officers in the respective States are enforcing restrictions and the dairymen themselves are trying to clean up the dairies.

A few years ago I made a trip through Europe and I was impressed by the fact that they did not take the presentations even these in the up the dairies.

A few years ago I made a trip through Europe and I was impressed by the fact that they did not take the precautions over there in the production of milk that we do here. A lady on the steamer had a case of milk that she bought from one of the big eastern dairies and which kept sweet during the trip across the ocean. She had made the trip several times and she commented on the fact that it was almost impossible to secure such high-grade milk in Europe to be used during the return trip. They apparently depend upon pasteurization to help an inefficient system of dairy inspection, and yet they are not afraid to consume dairy products over there.

Secretary National Dairy Union, Catawissa, Pa.

Dear Sir: I have your letter of March 18, also House resolution No. 137. For the State of Montana I can say that 90 per cent of our creameries are in good sanitary condition; in fact, almost as much so as they could possibly be. Although now and then we find cream that is unfit for use and destroyed, as a rule cream arrives in a clean and good condition.

Will say that during the winter months pasteurizing is not carried on very extensively; but practically all creameries are pasteurizing during the summer months.

As the inspection of dairy cattle for tuberculosis is carried on almost continually, very few dairy cattle are found to be infected. Last year in several cases of whole counties inspected only one or two diseased animals were found.

I see no reason why the inspection of dairies, creameries, and products could not be carried on successfully without the assistance of Federal supervision.

Dear Mr. Creasy: Your letter of the 15th instant received with your inquiry as to the questions that were asked by Mr. Rawl's department relating to cream.
It is true that when cream contained 0.02 per cent of acid it was regarded second-grade cream, and all of that class of cream went into the class that made up the 61.05 per cent that was "unwholesome, insanitary, and unfit for food." It is almost useless to comment upon this, as cream with an acid test of 0.02 per cent would be practically sweet cream, and could be used for coffee. It is also a fact that nearly all the milk delivered to cheese factories that goes into our best cheese contains 0.02 per cent of acid.

Of course, this question was just as technical as all the other questions. All sweet cream is ripened to make butter out of to an acidity of 4.05 per cent. Therefore it is, as I said above, useless to comment upon it.

upon it. Respectfully, yours,

Mr. WM. T. CREASY,

Care of the National Dairy Union, Catawissa, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 18th instant duly received, inclosing copy of the Linthicum resolution introduced in the House of Representatives in connection with the creameries and creamery products of this country. Speaking for the creameries of Virginia, I am of the opinion that the conditions described by Mr. Linthicum do not prevail in the creameries of this State. I am not in favor of Federal inspection of creameries, and I believe that creamery inspection will be much better handled by the local State authorities than under the supervision of the Federal Government. I may add that there are few, if any, creameries in Virginia that are not pasteurizing their product.

Yours, very truly,

BENJ. L. PURCELL. Commissioner.

University of Maine, Orono, Me., March 20, 1916.

WILLIAM T. CREASY, Secretary National Dairy Union, Catawissa, Pa.

Bear Sir: Your letter of March 18 is received. I have read the resolutions introduced in Congress with surprise. It is true that I do not have at hand definite data concerning the situation in Maine, especially in comparison with the figures given in this resolution, which I assume were supposed to represent average conditions.

I am fairly positive that practically all cream sold by creameries in Maine has been pasteurized. We make very little butter, and it is probable that the statement would not be expected to apply to Maine conditions. Engaged in the sweet-cream business, as we are, it could not be true that approximately 60 per cent of cream used was unclean or decomposed. It certainly is not true, so far as Maine is concerned, that 94 per cent of the creameries in the State are insanitary. It is true that conditions are not all that any one would like to see in some plants, but in most of the creamery plants of the State managers seem to take real interest and pride in keeping their plants in the best possible condition.

The condition with respect to tuberculosis among cattle is fairly well covered by reports of State officials, copies of which can be secured by addressing the commissioner of agriculture, Augusta, Me. I think he might also be able to give you a very clear statement with respect to the conditions of the dairies in the State, since he is in charge of such inspection as is being done by State control.

Very truly, yours,

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Senate to indulge me, and I especially request the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. Simmons], who has the pending bill under his charge, to suspend long enough to let me ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at this time. It is a bill which proposes to extend for 35 years more the period of time within which the Saginaw and Manistee Lumber Co. in Arizona may cut certain timber which this company owns. I should like to have the report of the Department of Agriculture read. It is very short, and will consume only three or four minutes

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Is this a House bill?
No; it is a Senate bill. Mr. PENROSE. Mr. ASHURST.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is now so near the time for the taking of the recess that there is hardly opportunity for anybody to make a speech. That is the reason why I am going to consent. In view of that fact, if it will not lead to any discussion, I shall not interpose an objection.

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to have the report of the Department of Agriculture read before Senators give their consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, Washington, February 20, 1917.

Hon. Henry L. Myers,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

Dear Senator Myers: Receipt is acknowledged of your request of February 6 for a report upon the bill (8. 8126) to extend the time for cutting of timber on the Coconino and Tursayan National Forests in Arizona, with the request that your committee be sent such suggestions as this department may desire to make.

The Saginaw & Manistee Lumber Co. now holds the right to cut the timber on about 75,000 acres of land within the Tusayan and Coconino National Forests, Ariz. The lands covered by these timber rights lie wholly in odd-numbered sections which were originally part of the land grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad. This right was obtained under an agreement with the Secretary of the Interior, made prior to the passage of the act of February 1, 1995, which transferred the administration of the national forest to this department. On about 45,000 acres of this land the right of the company to cut timber will expire on January 12, 1926, but there is no definite date for the expiration of their rights on the remainder of the area. The company operates a sawmill, which is the chief industry in the town of Williams, Ariz, and now supplying this mill with logs from its timber-right holdings which are not subject to expiration in 1926.

In the past this company has purchased considerable amounts of national-forest timber from the even-numbered sections intermingled with the odd-numbered sections on which it holds timber rights. It now states, however, that it is unable to continue to buy national-forest timber from the even-numbered sections intermingled with the odd-numbered sections on which it holds timber rights it company any other that it is obliged to cut, prior to 1926, the timber to which it rights of the company its right will expire in that year. It is probable that by logging exclusively in its own timber the company can complete the cutting of these holdings prior to the date of the expiration of its rights. Logging odd-numbered sections exclusively, however, would increase the cost to the company and would leave the national-forest timber on the adjoining even-numbered sections somewhat less valuable than if it were sold for logging at the time the odd-numbered sections were cut. If the Government timber and the company's timber are logged at the same time the same logging railroads could be used and the expense of their construction per thousand feet logged would be reduced. This has been the result of the sales of national-forest timber which have previously been made to this company.

The timber-right holdings of the company are now subject to local taxation. The early completion of cutting by the company would remove this source of revenue to the county and State. If the company is in a position to purchase the national-forest stumpage intermingled with its own, the State and county will also benefit as a result of the higher stumpage prices which will be received than if the Government timber is sold by itself, since the State receives 25 per cent of the receipts on account of the retention by the Government of title to school sections within the national forests for the benefit of the schools and roads, and in addition Arizona receives approximately 11 per cent of the receipts on account of the retention by the Government of title to school sections within the national forests. It is also probable that the cutting of the timber on both even-numbered sections and odd-numbered sections together would result in a longer life of the local lumber manufacturing industry than would otherwise be the case.

Title to the land on which the company now holds its timber rights is vested in the United States. These lands when cleared of the right of the company to cut the present crop of timber thereon constitute a part of the timber-growing area of the national forests. The terms under which the company now holds its timber rights result in the leaving of partment has no objection the action which it contemplates would be of advantage to the United States.

As the bill is now written it might possibly be contended that the failure to execute an agreement would still have the effect of extending the time within which the company may continue cutting under its present contract with the Interior Department. In order, therefore, to clear away any possible ambiguity it is believed that the last proviso should be amended by striking out of line 4, page 2, the colon and what follows, and substituting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following "but this act shall not be construed to confer upon said company any other rights in addition to those held by the company at the time of said reconveyance, and in the absence of the execution of such an agreement this act shall neither extend nor restrict the present rights of the company."

The word "hundred," which begins line 12, page 1, should be stricken out since it duplicates the same word at the end of line 11. As thus amended this department would have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON,

Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 12, after the date "nineteen hundred," to strike out the second word "hundred," and on page 2, to strike out the proviso beginning on line 2, as follows: "And provided further, That in the absence of the execution of such an agreement all existing rights of the company to cut and remove the timber from such lands shall continue in effect unchanged by this act; but this act shall not be construed to confer upon said company any other rights in addition to those held by the company at the time of said reconveyance," and to insert "; but this act shall not be construed to confer upon said company any other rights in addition to those held by the company at the time of said reconveyance, and in the absence of the execution of such an agreement this act shall neither extend nor restrict the present rights of the company," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the rights of the Saginaw and Manistee Lumber Co. and its successors in interest to cut and remove the timber from such of the lands within the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests as were reconveyed to the United States, subject to outstanding timber-right contracts held by said company, under the rules, regulations, and conditions imposed by the Secretary of the Interior at the time of said reconveyance, are hereby extended to and until the 31st day of December, A. D. 1950: Provided, That said company executes and enters into an agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture to comply with such additional requirements as may be mutually agreed upon to promote forest-fire protection, reforestation, and forestry administration; but this act shall not be construed to confer upon said company any other rights in addition to those held by the company at the time of said reconveyance, and in the absence of the execution of such an agreement this act shall neither extend nor restrict the present rights of the company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is this a Senate bill?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; it is a Senate bill.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the first time I have heard of the bill, Mr. President, and I really do not know what it contains. I suppose, however, it will be considered carefully in the House; and as it is now time to take a recess, I am not going to object to its consideration if the Senator from Arizona says it is all

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to assure the Senator that in my opinion the bill is a just and proper bill. I wish to say for the RECORD that it was drawn in the Forestry Bureau and introduced by me somewhat at their request. The attorneys and the general manager for the company came on here, and hearings were held before the bureau, and the letter just read is signed by the Secretary of Agriculture. It is a bill, in my judgment, that the Senate ought to pass. I could say a vast deal about the bill, but I do not suppose it is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY FOR DRAINAGE OPERATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 7710, which I have been trying to get disposed of two or three times, and to which there is no objection. I want to have it passed here in order that it may go to the House. It appertains to a drainage proposition in Florida, and unless it passes at this time it will result in great loss to the State.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill has already been read, and I have no objection to its consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 7710) to amend the irrigation act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 1095), section 18, and to amend section 2 of the act of May 11, 1898 (30 Stats., p. 404).

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 18 of what is generally known as the irrigation act of arch 3, 1891 (26 Stat., p. 1095), be, and is hereby, amended so as

That section 18 of what is generally known as the irrigation act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., p. 1095), be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That the right of way through the public lands and reservations of the United States is hereby granted to any canal or ditch company formed for the purpose of irrigation or drainage and duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, and which shall have filed or may hereafter file with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of the ground occupied by the water of the reservoir and of the canal and its laterals, and 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof; also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of the canal or ditch, material, earth, and stone necessary for the construction of such canal or ditch: Provided, That no such right of way shall be so located as to interfere with the proper occupation by the Government of any such reservation, and all maps of location shall be subject to the approval of the department of the Government having jurisdiction of such reservation; and the privilege herein granted shall not be construed to interfere with the control of water for irrigation and other purposes under authority of the respective States or Territories."

SEC. 2. That section 2 of the act of May 11, 1898 (30 Stat., p. 404), be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. That rights of way for ditches, canals, or reservoirs heretofore or hereafter approved under the provisions of sections 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the act entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, may be used for purposes of water transportation, for domestic purposes, or for the development of power, as subsidiary to the main purpose of irrigation or drainage."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to amend the constant of the committee on line 17, after the word "com-

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to amend the amendment of the committee, on line 17, after the word "company," by adding the words "or drainage district."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. After the word "company," on line 17, page 2, it is proposed to insert "or drainage district."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate now take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst Brady Bryan Chamberlain Chilton Hollis Hughes
Husting
James
Johnson, S. Dak.
Jones
Kenyon Lewis McCumber Martin, Va, Martine, N. J. Myers Norris Overman Penrose Sherman Simmons Smith, Ga. Smith, Ga. Smoot Thomas Thompson Underwood Vardaman Walsh Works Chiton Clapp Cummins Dillingham Fernald Fletcher Gronna Kern Kirby Reed Robinson Sheppard Lane Lee, Md.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My colleague [Mr. Swanson] is just out after a serious spell of sickness, and on the advice of his physician he does not feel that it is safe for him to come out at night.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Harding], and also the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gal-LINGER

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Saulsbury] through illness

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. Townsend] has been called away by the illness of his wife

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask that the roll of absentees be now called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. POMERENE and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. McLean and Mr. Curtis entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask if the direction has been conveyed to the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms has been notified of the order of the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest that he telephone to the Willard Hotel. I think a notification there will bring some Senators

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of serious illness in his family.

Mr. OLIVER entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish the Record to show that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent from the city on account of sickness

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. Sauls-BURY] is absent on account of illness. I ask that he be excused from attending the session to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Saulsbury] be excused from attendance. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Delaware is excused from attendance at the session.

Mr. Brandegee and Mr. Lea of Tennessee entered the Chamber and answered to their names

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum of the Senate present.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what is the question now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is no particular amendment which is the subject of discussion at this time, but I wish to answer very briefly the argument of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Thomas], and I assure the Senate that I shall be very brief indeed.

After listening to the very lucid argument of Dr. Lane upon the characteristics of this hyphenated butter, I am not surprised, Mr. President, that about one-half of the Senate have been sent to their beds with disordered stomachs and are unable to be present to listen to the closing discussion upon the subject.

The Senator from Colorado, in his argument, stated that under all the regulations by the several countries of the world regarding the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, the people were able to purchase it for what it is. That false statementthat worse than false statement-is the very basis of all of the trouble in respect to the whole subject of oleomargarine. The regulations that are put in force by the several countries of the world are never for the purpose of allowing the purchaser to buy oleomargarine for what it is, but for the single and only purpose of preventing the seller from selling it for what it is not. There are no regulations in those countries upon the matter of the sale of butter. You do not have to sell it in certain kinds of stores; you do not have to put it up in certain kinds of packages; you do not have to place any particular or characteristic mark upon it. It may be sold in any grocery store throughout any of those countries. But you have to throw these restrictions around the sale of oleomargarine, because in every country it is known that the attempt to sell it is never for the purpose of selling it upon its merits, but that it may be palmed off, with a counterfeit coloring, for butter.

The Senator from Colorado spoke for some time, and he eulogized the German law. Very well. Then let me ask the Senator from Colorado why are you not willing to follow the German law? I will agree with you that the German law and the French law are possibly as nearly perfect as you can get in the matter of any law for the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; but what is the particular characteristic of those laws that gives them their special value and benefit? It is this: They entirely prohibit the coloring of oleomargarine. They do not permit it to be colored in imitation of butter; they do not permit it to be stamped with a counterfeit stamp, whereby it can come into the home as butter. No one is ever going to take a cake of tallow, if it is on the table and be misled into thinking that it is butter. He can tell it is not butter by its color; he can tell by its granular substance that it is tallow and is not butter. No one will ever mistake a pail of 4 cents a pound lard for butter. He will know it is lard the moment he looks at it. But if you will mix the lard and the tallow and then add enough of oil to grease it down the throat of the consumer, so that he will not need a scraper for the roof of his mouth after he has taken a taste of the tallow, you may be able to deceive the consumer of that particular article.

To prevent that deception certain European countries—the greatest and the most scientific countries in the world, as stated by the Senator from Colorado—forbid the coloring of oleomargarine altogether, so that it must be sold upon its merits. That is all that the dairymen are asking to have done here.

You talk to us about our desiring to destroy the product. The law as it now stands does not destroy the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. The law as it now stands taxes oleomargarine only one-quarter of 1 cent per pound, while you propose to tax it at 2 cents per pound. Then, if there is any legislation which will destroy or tend to destroy the manufacture of oleomargarine, it is that portion of your proposed law which raises the tax from one-quarter of a cent a pound to 2 cents a pound.

What is it that we attempt to destroy by the proposed legislation? We attempt, Mr. President, to destroy the ability to counterfeit. We penalize the counterfeiting. At what time in his life has the Senator from Colorado arrived at the conclusion that it is un-American to pass a law that will condemn counterfeiting, because that is all the law of 1902 does? It places a penalty upon counterfeiting, by coloring oleomargarine in imitation of butter; and as it is colored in imitation of butter, the only and the sole purpose being to sell it for butter, the penalizing of that counterfeiting is just and proper in every case.

Mr. President, as I have stated, we penalize nothing but counterfeiting; and if you want to avoid that penalty you can do it very easily. All in the world you have to do is to say that it shall not be counterfeited by giving it a butter color. That will not harm the article any.

I do not think there is very much argument in the proposition that the oleo is colored in order that it may be more presentable. White butter, as has been stated by one of the Senators here to-day, sells for a higher price than the golden-colored butter, and you do not have to color it white in order to get a good market price for it. Butter is tested, not by its color, but by its quality.

That is not all. Under the law of every State if butter contains more than a certain percentage of water it is tabooed as being against the pure-food law of the State. I know of no law against there being as much moisture or water as may be desired in a pound of oleomargarine. I think that most pure-food men would believe that the more water it contains and the less lard that enters into its constituency, the more healthful it would be, and therefore there would be no objection against any quantity of water being made a part of oleomargarine on the ground of its being antagonistic to the pure-food law.

Mr. President, we have heard much about the renovating of butter, and Senators have asked why can not oleomargarine be renovated. What is done by the process of renovating? When butter is renovated, the butter is not destroyed; no butter is taken out of it. Some ingredient, such as an acid which it has acquired through age, may be taken out, but the butter is not injured; the butter fat is not changed; in fact, it may be a purer article after it has gone through the renovating process than when it went into the renovating machine, but it goes in as butter and it comes out as butter. When a pail of lard is changed in color and stearin and oleo oil and cottonseed oil are added, you still have have nothing but beef fat and hog fat and oil. It is not butter and its character is not changed.

Mr. President, let any Senator use his own good sense. Does anyone believe for a single moment that a pail of lard costing 4 cents a pound can be taken and by any chemical legerdemain be changed into something that is not lard? Can Senators make themselves believe that if they should spread lard upon a slice of bread and eat it, they would have eaten something else? Can any of you deceive yourselves with the idea that when you have consumed a pound of beef tallow you have not consumed tallow, but that you have consumed some other article that is just as good as butter? Every chemist will tell you that tallow is not assimilated as easily as is butter; every physician will tell you that butter fat is taken up more easily by the human stomach than is lard fat. It may be that a person who is in a good, healthy condition might be able to eat a reasonable quantity of lard on his bread or a reasonable quantity of tallow on his bread, but he could not use as much of either of those articles without injury as he could of good

We are only making one little request, and that is that the Congress of the United States shall so legislate that the man who sits down at the table, at a boarding house, for instance, will know that he is getting oleomargarine when he asks for it, and will know that he is getting butter when he wants it. am not trying to protect the manufacturer or the retail dealer or the wholesale dealer; they will take care of themselves; they do not eat it. I am trying to protect the man who works in the woods, who works out in the logging camp, the man who boards at the second class or the third class hotel, the man who gets a 25-cent dinner at a restaurant and prefers to eat butter. want a law that will protect him; and I believe that the law would be far beter than it is to-day if we would take away entirely the 10-cent tax and then enact a most rigid provision against the deceptive coloring that is put into this product, and follow it right down to the very table itself. I presume that it would be rather difficult to draft a law that would impose a punishment for the use of oleomargarine on the table, unless the law were enacted with some purpose of regulation in view, and, therefore, we would need to impose some slight tax: I do not care whether it is one mill to the pound or one-quarter of a cent to the pound, so long as the Government can keep its hands upon the article and prevent its being used to counterfeit another article from the time it comes out of the hog in the packing house or from the time it comes out of the beef in the packing house, until it is dished up upon the American table. I do think that we are asking anything too much.

Mr. President, the manufacturers of oleomargarine are not complaining against the tax. You can not find one of them who would be willing to-day to surrender the tax of 10 cents a pound upon condition that he should not color his oleomargarine to deceive. They prefer the deception because they know that it is through the deception that they will be able to foist it upon the American public.

We can very easily settle the matter as to whether there is a desire to tax this product out of existence by modifying the amendment and providing that there shall be no coloring of oleomargarine in imitation of butter. If the amendment could be so modified, then you could tax it half a cent a pound or any other amount desired, and there would be no complaint on the part of the farmer who produces butter or on the part of the

I do not think, Mr. President, if one would spend hours in the discussion of this subject that he could change the opinion of those who stick with tenacity to the idea of coloring oleo-They will not surrender that point. When they do, they have surrendered the market for oleomargarine. If it is good for consumption by the American public, it is just as good when it is the color of lard as it is when of a golden yellow, and is just as healthful. If it is desired to make it cheap to the laborer, who seems to excite so much interest on the part of some in connection with this matter, just cut off the tax and let him buy it. No laborer is going to pay the 10 cents a pound difference between an uncolored pound of oleomargarine and a colored pound of it. He will buy the uncolored and save the 10 cents, if he wants it at all; but the whole truth of the matter is that he will not buy it. The real consumers of oleomargarine, as I have already stated, are the hotel keepers, the restaurant keepers, and those in logging camps.

I agree with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that it is a substance that will not spoil as quickly as butter. Therefore, it can be carried across the plains through the heat of summer and the cold of winter, and it will not change a great deal. It does not need to change, because it could not be changed and be made much worse unless there were some system of rotting it; and the stuff will not rot very easily owing to the way it is made, any more than olive oil or lard or tallow will rot. Butter will spoil. Why? Because butter is a substance that is easily assimilable; and that which can be easily assimilated, any kind of food, always spoils very easily. It is only that which the stomach can not even spoil and change its nature very much that will not spoil in taking it across the continent and through the heat of summer.

Mr. President, we are asking simply this on behalf of the butter makers—that you give them an open and a fair field. They are perfectly willing to sell their butter side by side with oleomargarine. All that they are asking is that you take your mask off of oleomargarine in order that the consumer may make his choice as between the two. You insist that the mask shall be kept on; and as long as you do, this fight will go on.

Mr. CLAPP obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

With the consent of the accommodating Sen-Mr. LEWIS. ator from Minnesota, I merely wish to say that since there was a request that the Sergeant at Arms bring in the absent Senators, and since it is apparent that we have a quorum and are proceeding with business, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Sergeant at Arms be relieved from making a report at this particular time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Sergeant at Arms be relieved from the duty of making a report with reference to absent Senators.

Is there objection?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I think the proper course is to move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. LEWIS. I accept the suggestion of the Senator. I desire to relieve the Sergeant at Arms from the necessity of interrupting the Senator from Minnesota by making a report at this time. I accept the suggestion of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Sergeant at Arms be relieved of making a report as to absent Senators.

Mr. LEWIS. And I accept the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would suggest that if the Sergeant at Arms has any Senators in reserve he had better hold them, as we may need them a little later.

Mr. LEWIS. That can be considered later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes appear to have it. The noes have it, and the motion is lost.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Chair say the motion is lost?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It appeared to be. The Chair will again submit the motion to the Senate. [Putting the ques-The noes have it, and the motion is lost.

Mr. LEWIS. It is apparent that the motion is lost.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I introduce an amendment to the sundry civil bill (H. R. 20967), which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary. The Senator from Iowa proposes to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in order to further facilitate the elimination of waste and duplication in the public service and in order that responsibility may be centered and expenditures standardized and made uniform hereafter a single committee chosen from the membership of the House of Representatives shall institute and prepare all appropriation bills in harmony with a scientific and modern budget system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenues to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the alleged excuse or justifica-tion for the pending tax bill is the necessity for additional expenditures along the line of the Army and Navy. I think it is not unfair to say that that excuse is related to the war that is now going on in Europe, and therefore I feel it fairly within the limits and courtesy of the occasion to refer for a moment to that great struggle.

There has been in this country, sir, a great deal of what has seemed to me unfair and unjust criticism because a portion of our population have seen fit, in connection with their citizen-ship, to refer to their blood. There is a difference between blood and citizenship. A man may be of one race, that race being dominant in the country in which he lives; he may be a citizen of that nation. During this controversy of the last few years a great deal of criticism has been indulged in because a portion of our people felt that their sympathy and their hope was with one side of the great struggle in Europe. We who trace our ancestry through two and some of us three centuries upon this continent have not hesitated to indulge in the right of expressing our sympathy, our hope, and our prejudice for whichever side in the European controversy that sympathy, that hope, or that prejudice might lie on; but a certain portion of our people, because they have expressed a sympathy, have been the subject of what I consider unfair and unjust criticism.

Mr. President, I have before me an interview given by the president of the German-American Alliance of the State of Minnesota, together with a letter. Both in interview and in letter he points out not only the right but the natural tendency of the man in this country who was born abroad, or whose immediate ancestry was from another country, to sympathize with that country in a struggle with another foreign country. But he also points out, with a clearness and a patriotism that should awaken a response in all of us, that while that right exists, while that tendency exists, while perhaps that duty exists, at the same time if there comes an hour when this country and that country should come into armed clash, it is then his duty and his privilege to cast his fortunes with this, the country of his adoption; and upon those of his own race he enjoins this I am going to ask that the Secretary may read the interview.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota presents a clipping and a letter which he asks that the Secretary may read. Is there objection? There being none, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the St. Paul Dispatch of Feb. 9, 1917.]

STAND BY UNITED STATES, TEUTONS TOLD BY MOERSCH—PRESIDENT OF GERMAN-AMERICAN NATIONAL ALLIANCE IN STATE SENDS ADMONITION TO ALL THE MINNESOTA BRANCHES—UNWAVERING LOYALTY PLEDGED TO AMERICA—PRESERVE PLACIDITY AND DIGNITY IN HOUR OF CRISIS THOUGH HEARTS BLEED AND BREAK, IS CALL SENT OUT BY MOERSCH.

Julius Moersch, president of the Minnesota union of the German-American National Alliance has sent letters to all branch unions in the State outlining what he believes should be the proper attitude of the German-Americans in Minnesota in the present national crisis. The letter is written in an official capacity as president of the State

"I hardly need point out to you that during this crisis no word should be said or deed done by German-American unions or by German-American individuals that might give food for the reproach that we German-Americans are more German than American.

PRESERVE DIGNITY.

"In this solemn critical time it is especially necessary to keep our wits about us and to preserve our placidity and dignity. No right-minded man will think less of the German-American because he has warm sympathies for the land of his fathers and busies himself in works of love and help in time of need on its behalf.

"If the Government of the United States has declared war against another nation, whether rightly or wrongly, then it is the duty of every American citizen to give his support to the measure adopted by the Government. About the justice or the injustice of the declaration of war, a higher power and the later history of the world will give

TRY TO AVOID WAR.

"On the other hand it is also the holy duty of each man to employ every righteous means at his command to the end that our land should not become involved in a war, and that the present differences between our nation and that of another nation may be smoothed out in a peaceful way.

"I am firmly convinced that Germany never sought war with America and does not now seek it, and that Germany never would attack our country. This knowledge must be a source of great comfort to all German-Americans in this anxious hour.

"If America should declare war on Germany there is only one duty for German-Americans, and that is 'stand by the flag of your country.' Our hearts may bleed and break, but that does not relieve us from the necessity of fulfilling our duty to the land of our adoption. It is the duty that we have taught our children, and is great and holy.

HOPES FOR PEACE.

"I still hope that it will not come to a declaration of war with Germany, but if this should happen there remains for us German-Americans only the course that I have indicated. We will never be ashamed of our German origin, but will be proud of it; never denying it in cowardly fashion. But to the land that now we call home, the birthplace of our children, we will ever remain un-waveringly loyal, though we do not boast of our loyalty in the hour of danger nor cringe to anyone."

STAATSVERBAND VON MINNESOTA, St. Paul, Minn., February 19, 1917.

Hon. Moses E. Clapp, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: Ours being an organization largely composed of alien citizens of Teutonic descent we have refrained as such from volcing our sentiments in regard to the present difficulties between our Government and that of the German Empire, because we do not wish to be regarded in any other light than that of loyal Americans.

It seems to us that in the present controversy between these two Governments neither the honor nor safety of our country is at stake, and we therefore would respectfully petition you and earnestly beg you to use your high office and best efforts to keep our country out of war, as long as such will be compatible with the honor, dignity, and safety of our country.

We thus speak for 23,000 loyal citizens of Minnesota, who wish to see the peace and happiness of our country preserved.

Very respectfully, yours,

Julius Moersch.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have incorporated these communications in my remarks with the greater pleasure, because, first, they voice, to my mind, a high ideal of grateful remembrance of the country from which these people and their direct ancestors came, and at the same time they voice an unwavering loyalty to the land of their adoption. Knowing these men and these people as I do, I believe in the absolute genuineness and sincerity of the declaration.

While I am on the subject of the alleged relation between the pending tax bill and the European war I regard it as fairly within the purview of this discussion to refer to another

About a year and a half ago the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] brought in a resolution warning our people from going into the danger zone of the European war. On the floor of this body he substituted for that another resolution, which, so far as its relation to the right was concerned, was a complete reversal of the resolution he had offered. The Senate, without stopping to understand the substitute, and to the great surprise of many Senators after they had done it, proceeded to table the substitute resolution; but in order that there might be a protection to some, or for some other reason, it was given out to the public that the Senate had tabled the Gore warning resolution and that certain Senators who had voted against tabling it were in favor of warning our people. Consequently by some they were characterized as cowards, by some they were charac-terized as disloyal, and all sorts of criticisms were placed upon them because it was supposed that they were in favor of warning our people against needlessly going into danger.

As bearing upon this subject, I noticed day before yesterday in the Washington Star a bit of information. I ask that there may be read from the desk the item which I now send to the desk

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota presents a clipping which he asks may be read. Is there objection? There being none, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of Feb. 20, 1917.]

KEEPS WOMEN AT HOME—AUSTRALIAN GOVERNMENT ALSO FORBIDS DEPARTURE OF CHILDREN FOR EUROPE.

LONDON, February 20.

A iaw has been passed by the Australian Government, according to a Reuter dispatch from Melbourne, forbidding the departure of women or children for Europe under any circumstances.

The Indian Government recently adopted, among its new war measures, a law forbidding women and children to sail for England except for the most urgent reasons.

Mr. CLAPP. So it would appear, Mr. President, that there are lands and countries where it is not considered either treason or cowardice to warn noncombatants, especially women and children, from going into the danger zone declared in war.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the pending amendment of the Senator from Alabama, there are three classes of people who are affected by the amendment. Two of those groups are abundantly able to voice their own sentiments. One is the allied group of those who produce cottonseed oil and live stock for beef, the Beef Trust. They are able to put out their information, their circulars, their telegrams. There is another group, composed of those who are engaged directly in the making of butter, and they too are able to have their organization put out their literature and send their petitions and telegrams. But there is one group of people interested in this subject who have no organization. They are unable to put their plea before Congress either through the instrumentality of petitions, literature, or telegrams. I refer to the man who is living on the border line of want, to whom every cent of the added cost of living to-day towers almost mountain high, the man who ultimately must bear the burden of this tax.

It has been my privilege to occupy a seat in this Chamber for 16 years, and aside from the proposition that was once made and carried here to tax corporations and except the holding companies, to tax the going corporation that brought into being the products for the people and except the holding company that stifles competition and sometimes stifles production, I do not think there has been a measure brought here of a tax-bill nature that is so remarkable as the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Here I want to say I have got to reconcile a difference. notice my friend from Alabama speaks of oleomargarine. am a good deal inclined to accept him as authority, but my scholarly friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks], whom I must also accept as authority, refers to oleomargarine. In this dilemma I think it would be a fair compromise just to refer to this product as oleo.

The present tax upon oleo uncolored is one-fourth of a cent a It is claimed that this material is wholesome; that it is not injurious to health; that it is a fair food product; and it is urged by its friends that it is the poor man's food. be true, I should like to have some Senator explain to me why it is that it is proposed to add 11 cents a pound to the product that we declare wholesome food and that is essentially the poor man's food? We have sought in legislation in the past, as far as possible, to relieve the man who is unfortunate and to place the burden of taxation upon those who are best able to bear that burden, but here is a proposition to start in now and increase the tax upon one article of food alone, and that article alleged to be a wholesome article and especially the poor man's food. How it can be justified I do not know and I can not suggest, because I have not yet heard on this floor a suggestion of a justification for starting in now and selecting a wholesome food product and putting a tax on that when it is alleged that it is not the rich man's food but it is essentially the poor man's food. This is inexplicable. But this is not by any means the worst phase of this question.

When it comes to imitations of a product there are two reasons why no product should be permitted to be imitated. the first place, it is immoral to practice deception, and that ought in itself to be a sufficient reason why we should never permit the imitation of a product. But there is another reason why it is wrong to permit an imitation. There is only one reason why a man seeks to imitate a product, and that is that he may get more nearly approximately the price of the product that is imitated. There is no other inducement for imitating butter in the making of oleomargarine excpt the fact that the more perfect the imitation the more easy it is for the man who makes the imitation to get for the imitation approximately the price of the genuine article. Strip it of that spirit and incentive of gain and there would be no reason on earth for Strip it of that spirit and imitating it.

So, not only is there the moral wrong but it makes it possible to take this cheap product which it is declared is for the benefit of the poor man and not only add a direct tax of 2 cents a pound on the poor man's food, but by allowing it to be colored in imitation of genuine butter to add to that tax of 2 cents a part of the difference between the cost of the oleomargarine and the genuine butter. Yet we are told that this is done here in the interest of the laboring thousands of America. It may be, Mr. President, that some of the laboring people in this country can be influenced by that argument. It may be that some of them can be deceived, but I believe that if we would talk less here about the Beef Trust and the dairy interests and go to this arugument directly to the consumer we would clear the atmposphere, the clouds of deception and confusion would roll by, and the man who toils for a living would realize that he has got to pay a tax to begin with of 2 cents a pound on every pound of eleomargarine which he eats, and so far as the deception can be practiced he has got to pay a part of the difference between the cost of manufacturing this imitation and the genuine product.

When the consumer of this country, facing to-day, as he does and as she does, the high cost of living, will realize that in the last analysis it is the consumer not only who is deceived, but that he is directly taxed 2 cents a pound, and then as much of the difference as it is possible to load upon him in the imitation of the genuine butter by the imitation article, there will be a response throughout this country, and the question will have to be answered why it is that in raising taxes here we let all food products of the land go untaxed especially, except one particular article, and that the poor man's food, and place first a direct tax of 2 cents upon that, and then the additional tax which he is obliged to pay so far as he is deceived in this imitation, and so far as in that deception it is possible to make up the difference between the cost of these two articles. The Senator from North Dakota says "a man has a right to eat butter if he prefers and to eat oleomargarine if he prefers, and to know it is oleomargarine and to buy oleomargarine at oleomargarine price instead of paying a butter price for it.

No, Mr. President, unwarranted as it seems to me much of this tax is, it does appear to me when you brush away these clouds and get down to the solid fact we are adding first a tax of 2 cents a pound to the poor man's food, declared to be the poor man's food by the champions of this measure, and then adding as much more to that tax as the maker of oleo-margarine distributing it sells it at, and finally to the man who sells last to the consumers of this article so much of the difference in the cost as it may be possible to obtain by reason of this imitation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I should like to ask if we could reach some agreement to vote on the pending amendment on the oleomargarine question to-morrow. If no one wishes to debate it at length, I would like to suggest and would be glad to vote to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator wants to submit that question to the Senate, I think we ought to have a call of the Senate and have more Senators present than are here now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To agree to vote on the amendment does not require a call of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I know that, but it means unanimous consent, I understand, to vote on this particular amendment, and I do not think any Senators here in the minority would want to consent to that without a call of the Senate, so that Senators who are absent may be here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator that I do not desire to interrupt the proceedings at this time by having a call of the Senate. I merely wanted to give notice that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to agree to an hour for a vote on this subject. Of course, if the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are not prepared to make the agreement at this time, we can let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. The minority certainly are not prepared, because there is not a quorum in the Senate at the present time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Shields] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum of the Senate

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Alabama that I do not think there will be much trouble in arriving at an agreement as to a very early vote upon his amendment. We simply desire that there be coupled with the request for a vote the length of time any Senator shall be allowed to talk upon the subject, so that the whole time may not be taken up by one or two Senators, and that there may be a vote, not at an evening session, but some time in the daytime, when practically all Senators will be present.

Mr. UNDERWOODD. I agree with the Senator about his suggestion; but what suggestion has the Senator to make as to what time is to be taken?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that can be better made in the morning, when more Senators are present. I know we all want to get through with the bill. None of us are hankering after an extra session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is satisfactory to me.
Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if we wait until the meeting of the Senate to-morrow to fix a time to vote on one amendment, and if then the idea of the Senator from North Dakota is carried out, fixing a time when we shall close general debate on the amendment, and then a time for debate under the five or ten minute rule, it would probably take the whole of to-morrow—Friday—to dispose of this amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not necessarily. I do not think so. I think we could get through some time in the afternoon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was not here when the Senator from North Carolina made his proposal. What is the object of asking unanimous consent to fix a time to vote on an amendment to the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not myself ask the unanimous con-The Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] made the suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to state to the Senator from Iowa that yesterday, just before the Senate took a recess, it was agreed that this amendment should be disposed of in advance of the bill, the first thing in the morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume, in the very nature of things, the amendment will be disposed of in advance of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Was there a unanimous-consent agreement of that sort reached?

Mr. THOMAS. I was in the chair when it was made, and the RECORD shows it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only desire to say that I should prefer that the matter should go along in the regular way, and, when the time comes to vote on the amendment, to vote on it; whether at night or day, it does not make any difference to me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President-The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield the floor.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. Тномаs] just remarked that it was his understanding that there had been practically an agreement reached that we should vote on the pending amendment to the bill in advance. I did not so understand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There has not been any such agreement made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I never heard of any such agreement. Is there a request for unanimous consent now pending?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no request submitted for unanimous consent. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, under the head "Title II, Excess profits tax," on page 2, line 24, after the word "includes," to insert the word "also," so as to read:

The term "corporation" includes also joint-stock companies or associations and insurance companies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the amendment is agreed to I should like to refer to the Record to see just what it shows in relation to the pending amendment. On page 4241 of the RECORD it is shown that this is what took place last night:

Mr. Simmons. Of course, I wish to pursue the usual course, which is to take the committee amendments in their order; but in view of the fact that this amendment has attracted special attention, and we have spent the day in discussing it, and probably the discussion upon it will be resumed in the morning, I think it might be just as well that we should disregard the usual rule and have our first vote upon this amendment. I think probably that would facilitate the consideration of the bill.

Mr. Warren. Mr. President, I think that is a matter that ought to rest largely with the Senator himself, with reference also to the author of that amendment, and his colleague on the committee, who is the ranking minority member.

Mr. Simmons. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is the ranking minority member, whether that would be satisfactory?

Mr. Pennose. What is the proposition of the Senator?

Mr. Simmons. The suggestion that we first vote upon the oleomargarine amendment.

garine amendment.

Mr. Penrose. So far as I am concerned—and I have no reason to doubt that it will be satisfactory to the others of the minority—it will be entirely satisfactory to dispose of the oleomargarine amendment first.

Mr. Simmons. Then I move that the Senate take a recess until 10.30 e'clock to morrow.

Mr. Penrose. Before that motion is put, may I ask whether the Senator's very able explanation of this measure will be in the Record to-morrow?

There was no action by the Senate as recorded in the RECORD. It was suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons], who has the bill in charge, that that was the program, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Penbose], the ranking minority member of the committee, said that he had no objection to it; but there was no vote taken on the part of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Did not the Senator from Pennsylvania say that there would be no objection to it?

Mr. SMOOT. He said there would be no objection to it. Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to be entirely frank with the Sen-

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's exact language was that it would be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my understanding that we did not reach an agreement.

Mr. THOMAS. He was speaking for the minority.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator from Colorado was in the chair at the time, I will ask him, does he understand that the Senate agreed that the vote should be taken upon the so-called Underwood amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. Such was my understanding. There were five Senators present at the time.

Mr. SMOOT. The Record does not show that the Chair said "Without objection, it is agreed to." It only shows that there was an agreement between the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Pen-

Mr. THOMAS. I concede that technically there was no decision upon the matter in a formal way by the Senate; but upon the announcement of the Senator from Pennsylvania that there would be no objection to it, the Chair assumed that the matter was so understood.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I certainly did not mean to assume any authority or responsibility to speak for my colleagues of the minority; neither did I imagine that there was any suggestion that a time certain should be fixed for a vote on the oleomargarine amendment. The casual suggestion was made whether there would be any objection to voting on that amendment first, it being a very important amendment, before other amendments were taken up, and I said good-naturedly that, so far as I knew, I did not know of any objection; but investigation may disclose the fact that there is objection. If so, I certainly have no power to prevent it or no desire to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I have said all I desire to say, and I yield the

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no desire to escape from any honorable obligation that has been entered into; I do not care in what order these amendments are voted upon; I had just as soon vote on the oleomargarine amendment as on any other amendment; but I do not want any time fixed for voting upon that amendment, and that was not included within the arrangement.

Mr. PENROSE. There was no suggestion last evening of the time when the vote would be taken.

Mr. SIMMONS. None at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. No one can tell when a vote may be reached. The debate has substantially closed, but we have all had enough experience in the fixing of a time for voting on amendments to know that after the time is fixed the debate is practically over, for the only thing that keeps in the Chamber the few Senators who do stay here, is the fear that some amendment in which they may be interested may be voted upon in their absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that the chairman of the committee or the ranking minority member of the committee claimed any right to fix a time for a vote. It was a mere negotiation in open session, in the nature of a conference. Neither undertook to bind anybody at that time by their action. I would really object very much to the assumption of authority by them to have bound those who were absent. They did not do so. I am myself very much opposed to singling out one amendment and voting on it, as I think we ought to vote on the amendments in the usual way, as we come to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill for committee amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand the Secretary is reading the bill for committee amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. He is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is being read for committee amendments. It has been heretofore read in full.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it has been read in full. But taking it up as it has been taken up now, and stating the amendments without reading the paragraphs in which the amendments occur makes it difficult to follow. I ask that the context be read together with the amendments, so that we can understand what they are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the paragraphs in which the amendments occur.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill for amendments.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 201, on page 3, line 15, after the word "organized," to strike out "excepting income derived from the business of life, health, and accident insurance combined in one policy issued on the weekly premium payment plan"; and in line 20, after "$5,000," to strike out "and" and insert "plus," so as to make the clause read:

Sec. 201. That, in addition to the taxes under existing law, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation and partnership organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, or District thereof, no matter how created or organized, a tax of 8 per cent of the amount by which such net income exceeds the sum of (a) $5,000 plus (b) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 2, after the name "United States," to strike out "and" and insert "plus"; and in line 11, after the word "income," to strike out "and" and insert "plus," so as to make the clause read:

Every foreign corporation and partnership, including corporations and partnerships of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, shall pay for each taxable year a like tax upon the amount by which its net income received from all sources within the United States exceeds the sum of (a) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States, plus (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States bears to the entire actual capital invested; and in case no such capital is used or employed in the business in the United States bears to the entire actual capital invested; and in case no such capital is used or employed in the business in the United States the tax shall be imposed upon that portion of such net income which is in excess of the sum of (a) 8 per cent of that proportion of the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income, plus (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income.

The amendment was agreed to

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 202, page 4, line 17, after the word "value," to strike out "at the time of payment"; in the same line, after the word "cash," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "paid in" and insert "at the time such assets were transferred to the corporation or partner-ship"; and in line 22, after the word "partnership," to insert "whether evidenced by bonds or otherwise," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of assets other than cash at the time such assets were transferred to the corporation or partnership, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business; but does not include money or other property borrowed by the corporation or partnership, whether evidenced by bonds or otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to read section 203.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is no amendment to that section, and I do not see any reason why the Secretary should read that section when we are considering only committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will simply read those paragraphs in which committee amendments appear.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 204, page 5, line 22, before the word "act," to strike out "the" and insert "such"; in line 26, after the word "partnerships," to insert "or corporations"; on page 6, line 1, after the word "derived," to insert "exclusively"; and in the same line, after the word "from," to strike out "agriculture or from," so get to make the scatter word. from," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 204. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section 11 of Title I of such act approved September 8, 1916, and partnerships carrying on or doing the same business shall be exempt from the provisions of this title, and the tax imposed by this title shall not attach to incomes of partnerships or corporations derived exclusively from personal services.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I have an amendment to propose to this amendment of the committee, and I ask that this section be passed over that I may have an opportunity to prepare the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that he desires to offer an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not the amendment in precise shape now. This provision reads:

And the tax imposed by this title shall not attach to income of partnerships or corporations derived exclusively from agriculture or from personal services.

I want to provide that it shall not apply to such part of the income of any partnership or corporation as is derived from

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator wants to add the word "part." Mr. OLIVER. I desire to offer an amendment, inserting the words "such part of the income of any partnership or corpora-tion as is derived from agriculture or from personal services." Mr. WATSON. Where does the amendment come in? Mr. OLIVER. Directly after the word "to," in line 26, in lieu of the amendment suggested by the committee. Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator offer that amendment

Mr. OLIVER. I will offer that as an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator desires time to prepare the amendment, I will ask that the committee amendment be passed over for the present.

Mr. OLIVER. I will offer the amendment to the committee amendment now

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary state the amend-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to restate the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. After the word "to," in line 26, page 5, insert

"such part of the income of any partnership or corporation as is derived from agriculture or from personal or professional services," and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not accept that amendment. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the committee amendment.

The Secretary. On page 5, line 26, after the word "to," it is proposed to strike out the committee amendment and the remainder of the paragraph, and to insert "such part of the income of any partnership or corporation as is derived from agriculture or from personal or professional services."

Mr. OLIVER. I think that the intent is exactly the same as the intent of the committee; but it is more clearly expressed, and I think it is free from objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I think this amendment of the committee and the amendment of the Senator are in direct conflict.
What the Senate committee amendment contemplates is not to exempt from the income tax any income not exclusively derived from personal services; that is, the corporation or the copartnership to entitle it to the exemption must be a corporation or a copartnership deriving its income exclusively from personal

Mr. OLIVER. It is incomes from agriculture that I have in mind.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not speaking now about the agricultural feature. Under the proposed amendment of the Senator all income of any corporation derived exclusively from personal services, although it might have income derived from other sources, would be entitled to this exemption.

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, no; Mr. President. If the Senator will read my amendment, he will see that it only exempts such part I of the income as is derived from agriculture or from personal services

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is taking a corporation and segregating a part of the income that is derived from personal services from the income derived from other sources, and exempting that part of the income which is derived from personal services from the operation of this tax.

Mr. BRYAN. And that part derived from agriculture.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and that part derived from agriculture. The committee made this exemption and put it in such language, or attempted to put it in such language, as to make it certain that it would inure only to the benefit of a copartnership or a corporation that had no income that was not derived from personal services

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, it seems to me that a corporation may have income from one source which would be taxed under this bill and also have a large income from agriculture. A firm of merchants, for example, in a country town may have some farms out in the country; and what I aim at is to except from the operation of this tax that portion of their income which is derived from the farms, not excepting that derived from other business

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, we have stricken out that provision entirely from the bill as it came to us from the House. Our plan is to leave the profits from partnerships engaged in agriculture and corporations engaged in agriculture subject to the tax. The Senator will see, on page 6, that the words "agriculture or from" have been stricken out, so that the excess profits of corporations or partnerships even from agriculture would be subject to the tax.

Mr. OLIVER. Not as the bill is printed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly not, in my copy of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 6, line 1, the Senator will see that the words "agriculture or from," contained in the House bill, have been stricken out, or our amendment proposes to strike

Mr. OLIVER. The copy that I have must be an earlier copy, because it does not appear in that copy.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has the wrong copy.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill as it passed the House has the words agriculture or from " in it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President-

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, we have amended that provision as it came to us from the House so as not to give corporations or copartnerships engaged in agriculture the benefit of the exemption. Under the committee's amendments, these corporations and copartnerships engaged in agriculture are as much subject to the tax as those engaged in any other line of business.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do. Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator yields the floor, I should like to take this occasion, in my own time, to call attention to the amendment proposed by the committee in line 1, page 6, where they involve agricultural copartnerships in this tax.

Mr. President, I think the House did wisely to exempt agricultural copartnerships from this tax. We are now in the throes of what we call the high cost of living. Every Member of this body knows that the remedy must come from an adequate supply of the necessities of life that come from the agricultural interests of this country. We have just finished passing a law providing for rural credits in order to enable men to get the funds to invest in land and in the improvement of land, to increase the supply of foodstuffs in this country. Every man knows that the law of business is the law of the aggregation of capital. The momentum of finance is no less true and un-changeable than the momentum of a man in the material world.

We have passed this law. We are attempting to encourage agriculture and the "back-to-the-farm" movement. Every man knows that real estate, both within a municipality and in the agricultural districts, can not avoid taxation. It pays the county tax; it pays the road tax; it pays the State tax; it pays the municipal tax; it pays the school tax. In the final and last analysis, in fact, every tax rests upon the ground.

Now, let us compare artificial production with natural production. The miner can determine his crop because he is the master of the season of mining. He can increase his force and increase the product of his mine. He can lessen the supply or increase the supply at his own free will. The same is true of the manufacturer in every department. It is wholly within his hands according to his needs, because it is artificial. But the man who farms has to wait upon a natural law, which is as capricious as the seasons, because it is dependent upon the seasons. He has lean years, disastrous years, like the year 1916 just past, when the accumulation of profits of from 10 to 15 years is wiped out, not because of bad business management, not from lack of foresight, not for speculative reasons, but because the windows of heaven have been shut, or storm and disaster has been turned loose from a providential source. Now you step in and say that he shall not have the profits of the full years and the flush years to recoup the losses of the years preceding, and you are discouraging with one hand the identical thing that you tried to encourage and are encouraging in the passage of your rural-credits bill.

I suspect that the reason why agricultural corporations were stricken out by the members of the Finance Committee was to avoid what they thought perhaps would subject them to the criticism that they were not treating all alike. They would have been subjected to that criticism had the nature of the businesses been alike. The farmer, however, is a man who has to depend upon a higher source than the mere rules and regulations of an artificial corporation. He has to depend entirely upon the caprice of the seasons, and it is notorious that for that reason he is a disorganized and a helpless man. Could he organize his business as other men organize theirs, capitalize it, and be sure of the return, the cost of living would already have been settled in relation to other affairs. But he is helpless, and the very drudgery and uncertainty that attend this avocation constitute the reason why those who follow it are notoriously poor. The only hope that we have for the adequate development of our agricultural resources is to take advantage of the laws you have passed extending him credit, and allowing him to form business combinations to reduce the cost of production, and in that way lessen the cost to the consumer.

It is true that you say there are very few such corporations. Why? For the very reason I have stated—on account of the uncertainty that always attends the production of a crop. It is the most uncalled-for, the most unwarranted provision in this bill, that you, right at the outset, begin to discourage anything like the formation of corporations in this notoriously poorly paid division of our great industries in this country.

I ask this body of Senators that this be stricken from this bill. If there is anything that needs the encouragement and help of this country it is the agricultural interests of this country.

It was said here to-day, even in the argument about the oleo-margarine tax, that the man who produces the cream and sends it to the market does not participate in the high price that is obtained for the butter. That is notoriously true of all the raw materials that come from the farm, for the reason that the farmers as a mass can not organize themselves and demand their share of the wealth they produce. Now, right at the very threshold of an era that looked like promising something of organization at least along the line of obtaining financial aid for the development of the farmer's vocation you step in here and discourage organization and say that if he or they earn above a certain amount you will put them in the same category with artificial corporations—those that artificially produce and those who can control their own laws of production and the seasons and times of their marketing. You propose that the farmer shall be put in the same category with them.

I appeal to this body of Senators, standing face to face as we do with the high cost of living, which primarily is based on the fact that the farms are being decimated, and that the production is not keeping pari passu with the consumption because of the unattractiveness of agriculture, to strike from this bill the inclusion of agricultural organizations for the promotion of that for which we all stand here to-night and plead from every direction that there shall be some relief.

Therefore I move now, Mr. President, as an amendment, that the words "agriculture or from" shall be added to the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he will accomplish his purpose by voting for the amendment which I have already offered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I simply move that we disagree to the Senate amendment, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending-the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he does not even have to do that. We will vote on the committee amendment. If he wants to leave it as it passed the House, he can accomplish that result by voting down the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, that is what I shall be very glad to do.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not need any motion at all by the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, as far as I understand the parliamentary situation, the question is about to come on the motion of the committee to amend the bill in this particular, striking out the words "agriculture or from," the object being to exempt copartnerships?

Mr. OLIVER. I have offered an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that the Senator from Pennsylvania has tendered an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Then, as I understand, the vote first comes upon the attempt of the Senator from Pennsylvania to perfect the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey correct.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I was under the impression that the Senator from Pennsylvania withdrew his amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. Not if I know myself.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The idea was that you were attempting to do what the committee has already done and what I am now trying to undo.

Mr. OLIVER. But, Mr. President, I was not attempting to do anything of the kind. I was attempting to accomplish just what the Senator from South Carolina is.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am very glad to know that. Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor. Does he yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska. Mr. NORRIS. I want to submit this proposition—that we ought first to vote on the committee amendments before we vote on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because the Senator from Pennsylvania undertakes to strike out the line or part of the line beginning on page 5 and all of lines 1 and 2 on page 6 and insert something else. There are two or three of the committee amendments—three of them, at least—which seek to perfect the text that the Senator from Pennsylvania moved to strike out by his amendment. Therefore, we ought to vote on the Senate committee amendments first and see whether that text shall be perfected as the committee has suggested, and then vote on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to strike that out and insert something else.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that it is in order now to vote upon the language suggested by the committee. If that language is adopted or disagreed to, in either event, the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be in order.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I am not very much of a par-liamentarian, but it seems to me that the proposition before the Senate originally was the amendment proposed by the committee. If that shall be adopted, then the only way that you can get my language into the bill is by reconsidering it.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no. Mr. HUGHES. No; I call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have perfected, or attempted to perfect, the text of the House amendment in one or two particulars in which the Senate, perhaps, is not particularly interested. One of them is a verbal amendment, the word "the" appearing in line 22, page 5. Now, the committee has a right to perfect the amendment. Then, after the text is perfected, and before the vote came upon the amendment as perfected, the Senator will have a right to further amend it.

The Senator from New Jersey is wrong.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, we certainly have a right to perfect the text before the Senator from Pennsylvania has a right to move to strike out anything.

Mr. BRADY and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not this the real status: The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to strike out certain lines in paragraph 204, and substitute—
Mr. OLIVER. In lieu of the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the committee amendment is not there yet. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to strike out certain lines, and substitute. Now, the committee undertakes to perfect those lines by certain changes in them-two different changes; not just one. The nature of the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is to substitute for lines 1, 2, and 3 at the close of that paragraph certain other distinct language. Would we not, therefore, vote upon the committee amendments to perfect the original language, and then, after we have perfected that original language, vote upon the motion to strike out and substitute, offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement made by the Senator from Georgia would be absolutely correct if we were going to offer a substitute for section 204; but that is not what the Senator desires. All he wants to do is to amend section 204. Now, if the Senate amendments are agreed to, the only way in which he could offer an amendment to the section, after amending it. would be by a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But he is amending it by striking out and substituting.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a motion to strike out and substitute; and, as it is a motion to strike out and substitute, you can perfect the matter to be stricken out before you vote on the motion to substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, of course.
Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly correct if there is a substitute for section 204. Then the proper way to proceed would be, as the Senator says, to perfect section 204, and then to offer a substitute for section 204 if the Senator from Pennsylvania so desires

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Sen-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield. Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Penn sylvania is to strike out, on line 26, page 5, all after the word "attach."

Mr. SMOOT. All after the word "to."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. All after the word "to"? Mr. NORRIS. Well, that is the next word to "attach"; all the balance of the paragraph?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Mr. NORRIS. No.

Now, that includes not only three committee amendments, but it includes some other language outside of the committee amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's position is right and we should vote on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania first, then what becomes of the committee amendment? We never would vote on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. We strike out the words that the committee amendment undertakes to amend. It is the same principle that we apply when an amendment is pending. We have a right to perfect the amendment itself before the question comes on striking it out and putting something in its place.

Mr. SMOOT. The way to vote upon the amendment is to Those who are in favor of the committee amendments will vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not necessarily.

Not necessarily. A Senator might be in Mr. NORRIS. favor of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania if certain parts or all the amendments of the committee were agreed to, and some other Senator might be in favor of the amendment if the committee amendments were rejected, while others might be opposed to it if the committee amendments were adopted. So we ought first to perfect th Senator from Pennsylvania seeks to strike out. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly, So we ought first to perfect the language the

Mr. NORRIS. We do that by voting on the committee amend-

Mr. SMOOT. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the position, if adopted by the Senate as he suggests. If we are going to do that, then we first vote upon the amendment inserting after the word "partnerships" the words "or corporations.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. SMOOT. Now, suppose that be agreed to.
Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the next amendment would be inserting the word "exclusively" after the word "derived." Suppose the Senate agreed to that.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the next amendment would be to strike out the words "agriculture or from," and suppose the Senate agreed to that.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; suppose it did. Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean to say that the amendment could be moved without a reconsideration of the votes by which these amendments were agreed to?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Absolutely.
Mr. NORRIS. The motion is to strike out the language we put in. If we strike out that language, the whole question is

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment then of the Senator from Pennsylvania would be to strike out all the language agreed upon after the words "attached to."

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator from Pennsylvania does not make that motion. He moves to strike out, at line 26, page 5, commencing with the words "incomes of partnerships or corpo-

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRADY. Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds, of course, that an amendment to the committee amendment is in order; but owing to the peculiar phraseology, since it comprehends certain language of the House text, the Chair holds that at this particular time it is not in order.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it understood that if the Senate votes upon the various amendments proposed by the committee, all of which constitute one amendment, my amendment will be in order upon the adoption of that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thinks so.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator's motion, then, would be to strike out all that had been agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, in order to bring this matter to an issue, I ask uranimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as adopted, giving the right to the Senator from Pennsylvania to offer his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Considered as adopted? Mr. HUGHES. With the right of the Senator from Pennsylvania to offer his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have an inquiry to make in regard to the committee amendment before it is adopted. I do not wish to do it in the time of the Senator from New Jersey. Mr. HUGHES. To bring this matter to a consummation, I ask to have the committee amendment to amend the text adopted, subject to the right of the Senator from Pennsylvania, or any other Senator, to offer such amendment as he chooses in the way of amendment to the committee amendment after the text is perfected. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Jersey kindly restate his request?

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment suggested by the committee be considered as adopted, with the right of the Senator from Pennsylvania, or any other Senator, then to move to amend it in any particular he sees fit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. OLIVER. I have no objection.
Mr. McCUMBER. I object.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota objects.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know now if the Chair holds it is in order to vote on each separate amendment proposed, beginning in line 26, voting first on the insertion of the words "or corporations"? That is one of the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Chair understands has been agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has not. I have been standing on my feet for 10 minutes trying to get a word in edgewise in order to address the Chair on that very amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wanted to get that clear, because when we get to the next amendment, then I hope the Senate will vote to disagree to it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator means the second amendment? Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The third amendment. I hope the Senate will vote to disagree to it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has reference to the committee amendment in line 1, page 6?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; striking out the words "agriculture or from."

Mr. NORRIS. There are two amendments ahead of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not attempt to settle this parliamentary tangle; it seems to me to be utterly immaterial; but I have an inquiry to make with regard to the committee amendment

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Chair if the request of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Hughes] was granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was objected to by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber].

Mr. VARDAMAN. I merely wished to have that understood.
Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina. Mr. SIMMONS. What I desire to suggest is that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania deals with three separate and distinct amendments proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair held that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is not in order at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to make that point.
Mr. CUMMINS. This is the question I desire to ask the chairman of the committee—on the amendment which consists in the interpolation of the words "or corporations," occurring in line 26, on page 5, and in line 1, page 6: How can a corporation render a personal service? Undoubtedly there must have been in the minds of the members of the committee some instances in which corporations, which are artificial beings or entities, can render personal service, but those instances do not occur to me. I should like to know what has been or is in the minds of the members of the committee with regard to that matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will state frankly to the Senator from Iowa what I understood to be in the minds of the committee at the time the amendment was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of The Senate is not in order, and we can not hear anything that is going on.

Mr. STERLING. We can not hear on this side. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of or The point of order is well taken. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will observe the language is "the tax imposed by this title shall not attach to incomes of partnerships or corporations derived exclusively from personal The committee conceived a possible case where a corporation will have no income except such as is derived from personal services of the members of the corporation. I think for a concrete example it was suggested to the committee that there is now in this country a very large corporation composed exclusively of civil engineers. The sole income of that corporation is from the professional services of the engineers who are members of the corporation. It does no business outside of obtaining contracts to do engineering work, and that work is performed by members of the corporation. The result is that the total income of the corporation is derived from personal services.

Another illustration which was in the mind of the committee and discussed was that of a law firm. Of course law firms are generally partnerships, but they are sometimes corporations. A number of lawyers can associate themselves together in a corporation, issuing, if you please, no stock, the total income of the corporation of lawyers being the fees that are earned by them, and they are divided under some rule agreed upon among

Another illustration was that of physicians. To state that would be a mere repetition of what I said about lawyers. The idea of the committee was that if there was such a corporation to do the work and they had no other income except that derived from the personal services of the members or experts in the line of the work of the corporation whom they employed, their income would be an instance where the corporation derived its sole income from personal services.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my first observation is that if it was intended by the committee to reach any such cases as have been suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, this language would not do it. If three lawyers were to incorporate it would not be the corporation that rendered the service, for no corporation has the right to practice law. It can perform no act in a professional capacity. If three physicians were to incorwas intended, as I suspect it was, to release all corporations or some corporations rather without capital, then I insist it should be made so general that either the presence of capital or the absence of capital should be the test and not the rendition of a service by the corporation.

I do not believe in the distinction at all based upon any such discrimination or division as has been stated by the Senator from North Carolina. Evidently the House did not believe in any such thing, because the House very properly limited the exception to personal service rendered by a partnership, which is simply a collection of individuals without the legal characteristic which follows a corporation.

I think we ought to pause a moment before we make any such distinction as is here suggested. I am sure that the three cases cited by the Senator from North Carolina are not provided for in the act under this language, for these personal services would be rendered by individuals and not by a corporation. I think the very character of the service is such that it can not be rendered by a corporation.

I am afraid that there are other instances which I am not able myself to mention or to describe through which some very large incomes would entirely escape taxation. There is no such discrimination in the income-tax law as I remember. This is based on the same general idea. If a corporation such as is here mentioned can be required to pay an income tax, why should not the corporation be required to pay the additional tax that is here imposed?

If I knew just who would be caught or just who would be exempted by this language I would have a more intelligent judgment, but I confess I do not know. However, I will put to the Senator from North Carolina an illustration. I do it because I have received some communications upon that subject. Suppose two or three gentlemen who are engaged in promoting Chautauqua lectures incorporate, as they have done. They have no capital substantially. They employ eminent personages to go about the country and deliver lectures and from that business acquire a considerable income. I think they ought to be excepted from the operation of this additional tax, but does the Senator from North Carolina think that these words will embrace such an instance as I have just given?
Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I am inclined to think they would. I do not myself see the distinction which the Senator makes. I understand the Senator contends that a corporation which is an artificial entity can not render any personal service, and that therefore that corporation can not derive any income from the personal service of those who may render service in behalf of the corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the case cited by the Senator from North Carolina I thought that was true.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the case the Senator put you have a number of gentlemen who are associated together as a corporation to deliver lectures. I am not quite clear as to whether that might be personal service.

Mr. CUMMINS. The corporation does not deliver the lectures, Mr. SIMMONS. They are associated together in a corporation. That is what I said. They are associated together in a corporation, and the purpose of the association is that the members of the corporation shall do a certain line of professional work.

Mr. SMOOT. They may employ others.

Mr. SIMMONS. They may employ others, but, as a rule, they do the personal work themselves. They are to do a cer-tain line of personal work. In doing that personal work they receive a certain compensation. That compensation, according to the terms of the incorporation, is to be turned into the treasury of the corporation and divided between the members of the corporation according to some rule they fix among themselves. Now, that is not the corporation rendering the service, but it is an income which comes to the corporation through personal service rendered, and it only comes through the personal service.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator be willing to amend this paragraph so that it will read-I will not attempt to quote it literally—but so that it will except the income of corporations derived from the personal labor or service of the members of the corporation? Mr. HUGHES. That is exactly what was intended, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is just what it would not do, in my opinion.

Mr. HUGHES. In my opinion, it would do it; but I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection at all, if the Senator porate the reasoning would be exactly the same. If, however, it from New Jersey will pardon me, to accepting any amendment the Senator from Iowa may offer which will make clearer and more certain the purpose the committee had, which, I think, I have accurately stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if the language suggested by the Senator from Iowa is adopted there will be many corporations in this country that will never have to pay a tax under this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say that I was willing to accept that particular language, which the Senator from Iowa proposed a little while ago.

If SMOOT, I so understood the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said I would accept any language that would clarify it; that if there were any ambiguity or uncertainty about it I would accept any language which would carry out the purpose. I have stated what was in the mind of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of corporations in which there is not a single, solitary person employed except those who are members of the corporation. I know of large corporations that will not allow an employee to work for them unless they become members of the corporation and render personal service.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator will remember, however, that I insisted upon the retention of the word "exclusively."

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course.

Mr. SMOOT. They do not employ a single person who is not a member of the corporation.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think the Senator from Utah has in mind the case of a corporation where they derive their incomes from nothing but the personal services of their employees. If they are manufacturing corporations, they sell goods.

Mr. SMOOT. But I am speaking of merchants—

Mr. HUGHES. Merchants, of course, would not fall within at class. They derive an income from the sale of goods.

that class. Mr. SMOOT. But the sale of goods comes through their personal services.

Mr. HUGHES. They are not within this language.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from New Jersey is right about that and I will point it out in a moment to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment, when I shall have answered the Senator from Utah.

In the case of a merchant, his profits, or, if it is a corporation, their profits are partly derived from the capital invested, and therefore they would not come within the meaning of this

Mr. SIMMONS. We intended to exclude them by the use of the word "exclusively."

Mr. SMOOT. That would be, of course, where they had capital stock, but they do have capital stock in such cases.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What corporation does not have capital

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator having the bill in charge if this was not the way this matter came about: The House provision only referred to incomes of partnerships, and, of course, that could apply to personal services; and the Senate committee put in the words "or corporations," and made no change whatever in the words "personal services"?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that there is a species of corporations in this country which are practically partnerships; two or three civil engineers, for instance, form a corporation, and operate as a corporation. They render their a corporation, and operate as a corporation. They render their services to various individuals, and the corporation sends those individuals the bills. The money goes into the treasury of the corporation and the profits are divided. They are practically a partnership.

The question with the committee was whether or not we wanted to lay an excess profits tax upon the earnings of men who had a very small capitalization, just sufficient to come within the laws of the State. Mr. SMOOT. They have incorporated for the reason that they think there is an advantage in being incorporated.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And therefore they should pay the tax.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that we discussed that phase of the matter. I have personal knowledge of a number of such cases. We went into the proposition rather fully, and considered it from every viewpoint. I have no quarrel with the Senator if he does not take the view that the committee took of the subject. But we came to the conclusion that such a corporation would not be properly subject to this excess profits tax as would be a corporation with a tremendous capitalization which would be permitted to earn a rate of profit upon its great capitalization before the excess profits tax would apply.

Mr. SMOOT. Such individuals take contracts in the name

Mr. SMOOT. Such individuals take contracts in the hand of the corporation, do they not?

Mr. HUGHES. I am not speaking of their taking contracts.

Mr. SMOOT. They do work in the name of the corporation?

Mr. HUGHES. They do work in the name of the corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. Just the same practically as any other corporation. poration does work for the corporation and in the name of the corporation?

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly; yes.
Mr. SMOOT. Then I do not see why they should not be taxed.

Mr. HUGHES. There are a number of doctors and surgeons throughout the country who have formed partnerships and formed corporations, who run hospitals and sanitariums in connection with their practice.

Mr. SMOOT. If they run hospitals they have money invested.

Mr. HUGHES. Then they would pay this tax, but if their income is derived exclusively from their professional practice they would not. Take the Mayo Bros., merely for illustration. If they have a great hospital for operating and practicing medicine, and so on, in the city of Washington, and there should be three partners who decide, for the purpose of convenience, that they will incorporate themselves, which is frequently done, and they derive no income except from the surgical operations which they perform, they would not properly come within the provisions of this proposed law; at least we thought they would not, and our language is intended to exclude them.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, perhaps, as a hospital is equipped with surgical instruments and apparatus of every description necessary to carve people up-

Mr. HUGHES. Or to cut them down.

Mr. SMOOT. And to make them whole if they are broken in two, and so forth, many times they have just as much capital invested in their business as have other corporations in their business, and it seems to me they should pay the tax.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator has the right to vote that way. Mr. CUMMINS. There is a very great hospital at Rochester, Minn.-the greatest, I suppose, in the world. I do not know whether the Mayo Bros. are incorporated or not. They have a very large income, and they deserve it. Does the committee intend that if they incorporate their hospital, to relieve their income of this tax?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, answering and giving my own opinion to the Senator from Iowa, I will say that their income must be derived exclusively from personal services or they would not be relieved. I do not know a corporation anywhere that has not any money invested and which derives its income exclusively from personal services. If there are any such, I do not object to it, but I myself do not know any that it would relieve.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are many corporations, of course, which have no capital stock at all; but I do not believe that those corporations were intended to be relieved, for few of them could be said to derive their income exclusively from personal services. Take the case of an insurance company without capital stock. It does not derive its income exclusively from personal services, I presume, although it always begins in that

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No, Mr. President, it does not begin in that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina has just suggested an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not begin in that way, because the promoters had to put up money to start it; it could not start just by personal services. It takes some money to start with.

Mr. CUMMINS. So it does with a corporation of lawyers or of physicians. They must have enough money, at least, to pay the fees of incorporation and whatever costs are incidental to organization. I am very anxious that the whole of the class that was intended to be covered by this exemption shall be clearly embraced in it. If corporations of lawyers and doctors are to be exempted from the tax, then I want other corporations, altruistic in their character, also to be exempted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Iowa let me inquire of him whether his view about this matter would be met if, after the words "personal services," the words "rendered by the members of the corporation," were added, so that it would read "to incomes of partnerships or corporations derived exclusively from the personal services rendered by the members of the corporation."

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that would be entirely satisfactory, if there was provision for a small maximum of capital; that is, the capital that is required to incorporate. It would not be substantially an earning capital, but every such corporation must, as the Senator from Georgia has said, spend a little money in preparing for its work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I meant to go further than that. The insurance company promoters, for instance, are compelled to put up some money to meet losses for a while until they build up a reserve. They can not start the company without having some capital, whether it is called a subscription to stock or voluntary contribution by promoters. It requires money to promote and start the company and to take care of the losses for a while.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, nevertheless, Mr. President, the income at any given time might be derived entirely from personal services, even though they had invested some capital in the begin-

Mr. President, I feel this way about it: I could not clearly see the cases that were intended to be exempted, and so I asked the question of the Senator from North Carolina, and this debate has opened up rather a pretty wide inquiry, and I hope that the amendment will not be finally disposed of to-night. It is growing late.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Iowa desires that this amendment shall go over until the morning, I am perfectly willing that that shall be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should be very glad to have this particular amendment go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I doubt if we will have as many Senators who understand it present at any one time to-morrow as we have to-night.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor. To whom does he yield, if to anyone?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It has been suggested to me that there are one or two Senators here who would like to say something on the portion of the amendment concerning which I raised a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have not reached that point yet.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that; but that is right along in the same line.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the next amendment in order. Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am going to ask this question while this matter is up, because I may not get an opportunity in the morning. The Senator from Iowa raised a question that caused me immediately to recall a like condition in my State. There is a sanitarium there that was organized with $100,000 capital. The income derived is from the personal services of the physicians and those who are employed to render service to those who are afflicted and brought there for treatment. Under the terms of this bill are they exempt from the operation of this tax? As I have said, their income is derived from their personal services; but suppose a dividend were to be paid to certain stockholders, would the infirmary corporation be subject to this tax?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the dividend was over 8 per cent it would be subject to an 8 per cent tax on all in excess of 8 per cent.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that my recollection is that this language follows the language of the English act, and the word "exclusively" there would prevent the corporation named by the Senator from South Carolina being exempted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My interpretation of that language was, that so long as their earnings were from personal services and not from the barter and sale or exchange of goods, they would be exempt, no matter what their earnings That was my understanding of it.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought the chairman of the committee had the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely desire to ask a question of the Chair to find out what was done with the amendment on page 3, lines 15 to 18, the portion proposed to be stricken out by the committee?

Mr. HUGHES. That was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Has that been passed upon?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think that amendment was read so hurriedly that a number of us did not know that it had been agreed to; and I ask that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered, so that we may have a vote upon it some time to-morrow. I think it is very important.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the vote whereby the amendment referred to by him was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, the Senator can make his motion when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not after it has been adopted here. There was no reservation made at the time.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator can reserve it whether there was a reservation made at the time or not. He can move to disagree to the committee amendment in the Senate. Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that I can, Mr. President. I think the amendment was adopted without a majority of the Senators being aware of what was going on. It was read so rapidly and passed upon so rapidly, that it fairly took the breath away from some of us when we ascertained that it had been adopted.

Mr. HUGHES. There is absolutely no question about the Senator having an opportunity to get a vote on that amendment in the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there is. Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I myself did not know that that amendment had been reached. Evidently there was no debate upon it, because I came in from the cloakroom as soon as I was told that the bill was being considered for committee amend-

Mr. HUGHES. There was no debate on the amendment. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am told that the section was not even read.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that the section was not read. Immediately after passing that paragraph it was suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] that the paragraphs in which amendments occur be read, and after that time they were read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The paragraph in which this amendment appeared was not read, but the reading of the paragraphs commenced after that. I hope the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber] will insist on a reconsideration of the vote by which that amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee to consent to a reconsideration of that amendment. Several of us desire to discuss it briefly, but we do not care to take up the time of the Senate now at this late hour in doing so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no sort of objection to the Senator from North Dakota entering a motion to reconsider.

Mr. McCUMBER.

Suppose I make it now and have it disposed of right now?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to the Senator making the motion now, if he so desires.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the vote whereby the amendment on page 3, striking out portions of lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment inserting the word "exclusively" on page 6,

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not allow us to pass over the amendment just reconsidered until to-morrow, so that we may have a full Senate here to vote upon it?

Mr. BRADY. My understanding, Mr. President, is that we have already agreed that that shall go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been reconsidered; that Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry about the amendment I was discussing. I understood it was to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the amendment as to the word "corporations "?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The whole amendment may just as well go

Mr. McCUMBER. I refer to the amendment on page 3.
Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that, but as I was returning to my seat I was informed that the Chair was just putting the question on the adoption of the amendment inserting the word corporations.'

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from North Dakota desires the amendment which has just been reconsidered to go over until to-morrow?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that particular amendment goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, my understanding is that it has been agreed that the entire section 204 shall go over until to-Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware of any agreement of that sort.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; if the Chair please, those three amendments are very intimately connected, and if we are going to put one of them over we had better put all three of them over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well. It is the understanding the state of th standing, then, that all of section 204 shall be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BRADY.

Mr. BRADY. That is very satisfactory.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the section will be passed over until to-The Secretary will continue the reading.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The Secretary. On page 7, after line 14, it is proposed to insert the following:

Sec. 208. Titles I and II of this act shall cease to be of effect on and after July 1, 1921.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which is to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "nineteen," so that it shall read:

Titles I and II of this act shall cease to be of effect on and after July 1, 1919.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is next year. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 7, line 17, it is proposed to strike out "twenty-one" and to insert "nineteen."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana

yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WATSON. I yield. Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that if you are going to make an amendment to it, you ought to make it terminate at the end of the calendar year, because the taxes will be imposed for the calendar year, and even the amendment suggested here by the committee runs it into the middle of the year. It seems to me that it would be very much better if the Senator would make it the 31st day of December, 1918.

Mr. WATSON. I thought it was to conform to the regular governmental fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. We will have to pay the taxes under this for this calendar year, and then, under that amendment, we would have to pay them for the calendar year 1919, or, in other words, the imposition of the tax with that amendment would be for two years

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment proposed by the Senator, I understand, would be for one year.

No.

Mr. SIMMONS. He proposes that the tax shall end in 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. Two years. Mr. WATSON. Nineteen hundred and nineteen—two years instead of four.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be two years and a half.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The tax would be given in for the calendar

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Mr. SIMMONS. But the tax would not be due until just before the expiration of the fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator does not mean to say that when we pay taxes next year we only pay them from July 1 of this year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean to say that the taxable year begins on the 1st of January or the last of December.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what I said. So I say, whatever you do, make it the calendar year, so that we will not be forced to make a report here for six months of any year. It is almost impossible for a corporation to do it. They close their books at the close of the year, and they take stock at the close of the year.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I think it would help very much if the Senator from Indiana would make it terminate at the end of the year.

Mr. WATSON. Then, in accordance with the suggestions brought forward, I withdraw the amendment I have already offered and move that the language be changed to read:

Titles I and II of this act shall cease to be of effect on and after December 31, 1919.

Mr. President, the title of this bill recites that it is a special preparedness measure, and my understanding is that the sole object of the collection of this huge sum of revenue is for special preparedness. How long is this special preparedness to continue? If I am correctly informed as to the amount of revenue that will be derived from the operations of this act, it will amount to $401,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Annually?

Annually-$226,000,000 so long as it shall Mr. WATSON. last of the special tax, and $175,000,000 to be derived from the act of September 8, 1916; because Title II is the excess profits tax, from which is to be derived $170,000,000 from corporations and $56,000,000 from partnerships, the two combined making $226,000,000, and $170,000,000 from the operation of the act of September 8, 1916, a total of $401,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. And the $22,000,000 inheritance tax.

Mr. WATSON. No; the $22,000,000 inheritance tax is not included in this, because it is in Title III.

Mr. SIMMONS. One-third of it is included in that.

Mr. WATSON. One-third-well, that only makes it that much worse

Mr. SIMMONS. The other two-thirds are included in the $175,000,000.

Mr. WATSON. My point is simply this: Under the idea of preparedness it certainly is not essential, and we ought not to be asked, to appropriate for four years.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana

yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WATSON. I do.
Mr. THOMAS. I suppose the Senator is aware of the fact that we have what is called a naval program of five years.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that very well.
Mr. THOMAS. My impression is that th

Mr. THOMAS. My impression is that this so-called pre-paredness will continue just as long as Congress will listen Mr. WATSON. To which I am objecting.
Mr. THOMAS. To which I am objecting also, but with no success.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if war shall come-if we shall unfortunately become involved in the great catastrophe that is being enacted across the ocean—future Congresses can meet the emergency as it occurs. It is the part of wisdom for Congress to answer questions as questions arise, to solve problems as problems are presented for solution. If we are here for the purpose of providing for preparedness, my judgment is that two years of appropriations are amply sufficient to determine this question of preparedness; and if war shall come, even in the meantime, future Congresses may well provide for the contingency that confronts the Republic, just as they have in the last two years.

In other words, the President has come before us and said that in his judgment it was the duty of the Nation to participate in a world-wide league for peace. If any such proposition as that is possible in the future, it is absolute folly, in my judgment, for us at this time to be appropriating these huge sums of money for military preparedness, especially in view of the fact that we may be asked to become participants in a league of that character.

Two years is ample for us to prepare in view of the present emergency that confronts us; for manifestly if this European war shall not continue longer than two years, or if it shall continue longer than two years, any Congress that convenes here will be able to take care of the situation that confronts us when that Congress convenes.

I am opposed, in the name of preparedness, to continuing for four years the appropriation of this vast and almost unparalled sum for like purposes of $401,000,000 each year.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's amendment provides for three

Mr. WATSON. The amendment provides for three years;

Mr. SMOOT. 1917, 1918, and 1919. Mr. WATSON. Yes. Now, I think it would have been much better and much more satisfactory and much more in conformity with public opinion and the present demands of public sentiment if it were confined to two years instead of three; but I offer this amendment because I do not think there is any good judgment in appropriating for four years under the plea and the guise of preparedness.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this money that we are raising now is for the year 1918 and not for the year 1917. fund that we are proposing to raise, according to the terms of the bill, is to be set aside and segregated from every other fund in the Treasury and to be spent by the Secretary of the Treasury for no other purpose than that of preparedness

Your committee selected four years as the period when this part of the bill was to expire, because the Congress has already solemnly provided, with the approval of the American people and with but little dissent in either Chamber, a naval program which, it is provided as a part of the program, shall extend through a period of five years, one of which years has already expired. The theory upon which Congress acted was that a certain number of war vessels, warcraft of different kinds and characters, would have to be constructed and put afloat in order to place the Navy of this Nation upon a footing upon which the Congress thought it ought to be placed in the interest of the safety of the country.

The proposition is now made, before practically any of the ships authorized have been built, to cut short this naval program, to curtail this great scheme of preparedness; and instead of a scheme of naval expansion which, it was estimated, could not be completed under five years, we are to restrict it to a period of three years, thereby cutting off two-fifths of the program upon which Congress has agreed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi

first addressed the Chair.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina to permit me to ask him a question. I am compelled to leave the Chamber. Is the Senator going to move to adjourn pretty soon?

Mr. SIMMONS. At 11 o'clock.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Very well. Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection I wish to ask the Senator if the naval bill, as reported to the Senate and now on the calendar, has not been immensely increased over the 5-year program that was mapped out; and does not the bill provide more than was originally intended for the first year?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the naval bill that has been agreed upon, as I understand, by the committee becomes a law, there will be a larger fund provided this year than was anticipated by the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. By about $175,000,000? Mr. SIMMONS. By about $150,000,000. Mr. President, if this money were authorized to-day the ships could not be built any faster by reason of the fact that we have increased the appropriation than they could with the smaller appropriation provided in the House bill. We understand that at this time there is very great congestion in all the shipyards of the country—the shipyards owned by private individuals as well as those owned by the Government. Only so many ships can be built in one year. The amount of money appropriated, in my judgment, is not likely very greatly to increase the number that can be built within the period of five years. I think the amount that we have provided in the naval bill that has passed the House will probably be sufficient to pay for all the ships that it will be possible to build within the next year. But however that may be, Mr. President, it is clear that it was the purpose of Congress, if the provision that is reported by the committee is put in here, that the fund raised in this way shall be a special fund for a special purpose, not to be spent for any other purpose. If we should finish the program in two years, or in three years, as the Senator has said, then, of course, there would be no necesssity for further continuing this act in force, because there would be no use to which the money could be devoted without further legislation, and in that condition, of course, Congress would repeal the act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield. Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of the fact the Senator says this special fund must be used for this purpose and nothing else, let me say that on page 2 there is this proviso:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may use such fund for other

Mr. SIMMONS. But it also provides that he shall reimburse it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (reading)- but such funds shall be reimbursed for any portion thereof so used.

But how? By another appropriation by Congress?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; reimbursed out of the appropriation for some other purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose the department does not have any money in the Trensury; Congress will have to lay taxes to reimburse it or issue bonds, will it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not unusual in the departments, where there are certain funds specifically set apart, to use one of them for another purpose, and then reimburse it. The money will go into the Treasury and will be kept intact.

Mr. WATSON. Is the Senator willing now to take a recess? Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I am going now to move a recess. Mr. WATSON. Very well.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. I make it 11 o'clock instead of half-past 10 because I understand that the minority desire to have a conference in the morning at 10 o'clock; and we think it but proper to give them at least an hour in which to hold the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock p. m. Thursday, February 22, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 23, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DIGEST AND MANUAL.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following resolution and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,000 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE RUTHENIANS.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 201.

The Speaker laid before the House Senate joint resolution 201, which the Clerk read, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 201) requesting the President of the United States to designate and appoint a day on which funds may be raised for the relief of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians).

Nor the relief of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians).

Whereas in the countries situated in the eastern part of Europe, the theater of devastating war, there are at least 1,000,000 of Ruthenians (Ukrainians) in dire need of food, clothing, and shelter; and Whereas hundreds of thousands of these people have been forced to abandon their homes and their property, and being deprived of all opportunity to provide even for their most elementary wants have undergone disease, starvation, and indescribable suffering; and Whereas the people of the United States of America have learned with sorrow of this terrible plight of great numbers of their fellow beings and have most generously responded to the appeal of humanity for assistance whenever such appeal has reached them: Therefore be if

Resolved, etc., That in view of the wretchedness, misery, and privation which these people are enduring, the President of the United States be respectfully requested to designate and appoint a day on which the citizens of this country may give expression to their sympathy by contributing to the funds now being raised for the relief of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians) in the belligerent countries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Hamill, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALEB T. HOLLAND.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill (S. 7601) for the relief of Caleb T. Holland be laid before the House, The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Caleb T. Holland, who was a private of Company E, Sixtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 18th day of April, 1864: Provided, That no bounty, pay, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, my understanding is that the House passed a similar bill (H. R. 7045), and the Senate through a mistake of some one laid the House bill on the table and passed the Senate bill.

Mr. GARNER. I was about to ask if a similar bill had been reported by the House committee.

Mr. MANN. The same identical bill was reported by a House committee and passed by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RESIGNATION FROM AND ELECTION TO A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

FEBRUARY 22, 1917. Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker:

I hereby resign my membership on the Committee on Indian Affairs, to be effective at once.

WILLIAM H. MURRAY, M. C., Fourth District Oklahoma.

The resignation was accepted. Mr. KINCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I nominate to fill the vacancy the Hon. WELIAM W. HASTINGS, of Oklahoma. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina nominates the Hon. WILLIAM W. HASTINGS, of Oklahoma, to fill the vacancy

The question was taken, and Mr. Hastings was elected.

GOVERNMENT FOR WEST INDIAN ISLANDS

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 20755) providing for a temporary government for the Danish West Indian Islands, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20755) to provide a temporary government for the West Indian Islands, acquired by the United States from Denmark by the convention entered into between said countries on the 4th day of August, 1916, and ratified by the Senate of the United States on the 7th day of September, 1916, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill referred to, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. The House having passed one bill and the Senate having stricken out all after the enacting clause and inserted a substitutewere both the bill and the substitute practically prepared by the State Department?

Mr. FLOOD. I think not. I think the Senate bill was pre-pared by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, consisting of Senator Stone, Senator Hitchcock, and Senator Lodge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. Flood, Mr. Harrison of Mississippi, and Mr. Cooper of Wisconsin.

EXCLUSION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS FROM NATIONAL PARKS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker lay before the House the bill (S. 4862) to exclude intoxicating liquors from national parks and national forest re-serves, a corresponding House bill being on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the approval of this act the issuance by any officer or employee of the United States to any lessee, permittee, concessioner, or other person, firm, or corporation whatsoever, of any permit or authority for the sale or dispensing of intoxicating liquors of any kind (including beer, ale, and wine) in any national park or national forest reserve is hereby prohibited, and the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture are hereby directed to take all necessary measures to carry this act into full force and effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, there is a regular order this morning providing for the reading of Washington's Farewell Address, and I do not wish to delay the' regular order of the day by entering into any prolonged discussion upon this bill. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request

Mr. FERRIS. It only affects two parks. All the rest are dry. Mr. STAFFORD. I visited the Yosemite Park and spent three weeks there, and I did not see any violation of the law that would offend the most strict prohibitionist. I think this is carrying prohibition with a vengance. Will not the gentleman withdraw his request for the present?

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to have the status settled. The bill was inadvertently put on the Union Calendar. I think the Speaker should rule that it belongs on the House Calendar. I would like to have that changed, so that we will not have to proceed by unanimous consent in the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is not on any calendar.

Mr. FERRIS. The corresponding House bill is upon the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6814) to exclude intoxicating liquors from national parks and national forest reserves.

The SPEAKER. That bill ought to be upon the House Calen-

Ar, and the Chair orders it to be placed there.

Mr. FERRIS. Why not let us dispose of that?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the reason that I wish to enter into a discussion of it. If the gentleman desires to have me make the point of no quorum and delay proceedings, very well.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not desire to do that. I withdraw the

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is recognized to read Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. NEELY read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety, and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any cir-cumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my political life my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my-zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead; amidst appearances sometimes dubious; vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging; in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present to offer to your solemn contemplation and to recommend to your frequent review some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all-important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and inter-st. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of your country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common Government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefit-ing by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own chan-nels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvements of interior communications by land and water will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and what is perhaps of still greater consequence it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one Nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advan-tage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same governments, which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations-northern and southern, Atlantic and westernwhence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and hearthurnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain and that with Spain— which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with

To the efficacy and permanency of your union a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the ndeption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union and for the efficacious management of your common concerts. This government, the offspring of eur own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular de-liberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the Nation the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common counsels and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines by which cuming, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government, destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which may impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distribtued and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

The spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind—which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight—the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives; but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct. And can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation prompted by ill will and resentment sometimes impels to war the Government contrary to the best calculations of policy. The Government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject. At other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the eumities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference of public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorites are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artifical ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmittees.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not legally hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by inter-weaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good-that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have at least believed myself to be guided by

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice and by that of your Representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmnes

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers. has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, with-out anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government-the ever-favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and

Go: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 17th September, 1796.

WASHINGTON AND AMERICAN NEUTRALITY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Towner], under the special order, is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, George Washington was in-augurated as the first President of the United States April 30, 1789. In his first inaugural he said that the destiny of the republican model of government was justly considered as "deeply, as finally, staked on the experiment entrusted to the American people."

How true that was is now fully understood by all thoughtful students of history. The close of the Revolution had left the Colonies still jealous of each other, discordant, almost antagonistic. The great mass of the people did not understand what a National Government meant. They were much more interested in local concerns than they were in the making of a nation. If we had not been given the little group of great men who gave us the best brain and the most disinterested service that ever made and saved a nation we should have been still struggling, broken and clashing fragments, clinging to the fortunes of European powers. Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Madison, Franklin—these and a few others were the makers and saviors of America. Praise is not enough for them. We owe them gratitude, love, almost adoration.

SUCCESS OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

Considering the gigantic nature of the undertaking, the success of the new Government under the Constitution was remarkable. Congress was fully organized. The work of legislation was put under way. The widespread apprehension as to the encroachments that might be made on the reserved rights of the States and the people was shown to be unfounded. The national courts were established and their orderly procedure was easily secured and their decisions respected. The President had made appointments, selected a Cabinet, sent ambassadors to foreign courts, commanded the Army and Navy, recommended legislation, and vetoed bills; and yet there was no apprehension of a monarchy.

The burdens of government rested lightly on the people. Import duties were almost the sole form of securing revenue and their burden was not felt. Trade between the States developed rapidly. The country was prosperous as it had never been

Mr. Jefferson, then in Paris, reported that the credit of the United States at Amsterdam, then the money center of the world, had become the first on that exchange. Foreign commerce rapidly increased; our exports were gaining every year and largely exceeded our imports. Shipbuilding rapidly developed. Not only were American vessels seen in every port of Europe, but a profitable trade was opened with India, China, and the isles of the Southern Pacific. A historian of the period wrote, "Already on almost every sea the Stars and Stripes began to wave."

But while domestic conditions were satisfactory and our trade and commerce developed rapidly, our foreign relations were strained and unsettled. England refused to carry out her treaty engagements. She stubbornly refused to vacate our western ports. She flouted our ministers, refused to send a representative to this country, and endeavored in every way to impede and injure our commerce. No express recognition of our maritime rights could be secured from her.

With France conditions were hardly more favorable. ferson had ably but vainly striven to secure better treatment than was accorded us by England. France seemed to have adopted the belief that our obligation to her for the aid which she had rendered us during the Revolution entitled her to claim all and yield nothing.

Washington, whose first task had been the organization of a new nation on a new model, found himself confronted with diplomatic tasks as difficult and exacting as had been his domestic problems. To his more than to any other single influence was due the success of our domestic policies. We shall see also that to him was due the fortunate settlement of our then pending foreign complications, and the determination of that wise and. may we hope, permanent policy that has safely guided us thus far in our foreign relations and should now and hereafter guide us in honor and safety throughout the years to come. plause.1

NEUTRALITY.

In the very year our Government was organized under the Constitution-1789-the French Revolution occurred, in its farreaching consequences one of the most tremendous events of all history. The monarchy was overthrown and the French Republic was established. The rivalries and hatreds that had long existed between France and England culminated in a war, which was formally declared in 1793.

The sympathy of the United States was naturally with France. She had been our friend and ally in the hour of our trial. had made with her our first treaty, and the only treaty of alliance we have ever negotiated. It was thought then, and is believed now by many, that without French aid the independence of the United States could not have been achieved. Arms and supplies from the royal arsenals were early sent to America. Millions of francs were loaned to us. Ships and soldiers were supplied. Washington secured the final surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown by the aid and effective cooperation of the French fleet. These things were yet fresh in the memory of American

On the other hand, it was remembered that it was the French King, whom the mob had beheaded, who had aided America. The anarchistic, atheistic, and licentious professions of the revolutionists and their bloody excesses had in large measure alienated the sympathy for the Republic that would otherwise have been universal. Still the demand for active participation in the war against England was strong and pronounced. The country was divided between war and neutrality, with a strong margin in favor of the former.

Washington's attachment to the French nation was deep. His sense of obligation was great. He sincerely desired the success of the Republic. But he early came to the conclusion that the best interests of the United States demanded a position of absolute and good-faith neutrality. A meeting of the Cabinet was called, and it was after conference unanimously agreed that a proclamation of neutrality ought to issue. It is certain that unanimity was secured only by the influence of Washington.

Accordingly, April 22, 1793, President Washington issued the following proclamation:

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia. Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands on the one part and France on the other, and the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers:

I have therefore thought fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid toward those powers, respectively, and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do also hereby make known that whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forfeiture; and further, that I have given instructions to those officers to whom it belongs to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the United States, violate the law of nations with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

By the President:

GEORGE WASHINGTON. By the President:

THOMAS JEFFERSON

This was a distinct announcement to the world that the United States would not take part in the war on either side, and that it distinctly placed itself outside the European system. It has been said by publicists and jurists that this proclamation has had greater influence in molding international law than any other single document of the century. Certain it is that its place is fixed as one of the great landmarks of international law. Not only in itself was it a great achievement, but Washington enforced it so impartially and Congress buttressed it with such wise and just legislation that the whole transaction reflects the greatest credit and honor on Washington and all who aided in its success. Canning, the British statesman, years later said in Parliament:

If I wished for a guide in a system of neutrality, I would take for a guide that laid down by America in the days of Washington and the Secretaryship of Jefferson.

Hall, one of the highest authorities on international law, says: The policy of the United States in 1793 constitutes an epoch in the development of the usages of neutrality. It represented by far the most advanced existing opinions as to what the obligations of neutrality were. In the main it is identical with the standard of conduct which is now adopted by the community of nations.

It has been said that the proclamation was the foundation of the Monroe doctrine, in that it marked out the true foreign policy of the United States to be that the Republic of the New World would hold itself forever aloof from the struggles of Europe. If it was not the foundation of the Monroe doctrine, it Europe. was at least in entire harmony with it. It is not too much to say that by this act Washington laid down one of the great corner stones upon which the fabric of our national greatness is founded.

But while the proclamation is now universally approved, it met with strenuous opposition at the time. Jefferson considered it as a bitter pill needful to keep the United States out of the war. He therefore supported the President and advised his party associates to do likewise. His advice was not heeded, however. Madison declared:

The proclamation was in truth a most unfortunate error.

Indeed, it became the signal for the outbreak of a party war. The opposition declared that it put us in the position of cold indifference between the parties to the war in Europe, when by every claim of gratitude our obligation was to be hostile to England and friendly to France. A most bitter personal warfare was instituted. Even Washington did not escape. For the first time he was to suffer abuse and calumny. It was charged that the President was fast debauching the country. He was seeking a crown. He was passing himself off as an honest man. These were among the comments of the partisan press. greatly pained and angered Washington. He declared-

He had rather be in his grave than in his present condition; that he would rather be on his farm than emperor of the world; and yet they were charging him with wanting to be a king!

But, though indignant and hurt, he was not swerved from his course. He stood firmly for the proclamation and its strict enforcement.

This great act, which did so much to strengthen the Nation in the days when it needed strength, and which has done so much to wisely mold our foreign policy through all the years that have followed, was Washington's own. It was he who origi-nated it; it was he who formulated it; who pressed it; who induced a reluctant Cabinet to agree to it; who stood like a rock in its defense against the waves of clamor and abuse that beat against him. Time has silenced criticism, but it should not silence the voice of appreciation for an act now especially worthy of consideration and regard. [Applause.]

GENET.

While these events were in progress an incident occurred which added greatly to the President's embarrassments and It had been decided, after some hesitancy, to receive a minister from the newly proclaimed French Republic. Edmond Charles Genet, "Citizen Genet," as he was called, was accordingly accredited, and landed at Charleston a short time before the neutrality proclamation was issued. He was young, enthusiastic, and sadly lacking in tact and discretion. Hardly had he landed before he began to issue army and navy commissions to whoever would promise to fight for France. He issued letters of marque. He fitted out two privateers, which, under the French flag, and manned by American seamen, cruised in American waters and captured British merchantmen within sight of our shores. He treated the United States as a dependency of France.

It can be imagined how he received the news of the proclama-He denounced it as a violation of our treaty with France. He abused Washington and threatened to appeal to the people against him. He denounced Jefferson as an ingrate, and charged he had violated his promises. But such was his engaging personality and such was the sympathy for France among the people that everywhere he went Genet was received with enthusiasm. His progress through the country was a continual ovation. He was received at Philadelphia, the seat of government, in a perfect frenzy of applause. He was dined and wined and lavishly lauded and praised.

It was considered necessary by the administration to procure Genet's recall. This was Washington's decision, and in that decision all the members of the Cabinet concurred. Meanwhile the enthusiasm waned. Genet's abuse of Washington was re-sented. During it all Washington stood firm. He informed the French Government of the indiscretions of their minister and France recalled him, with expressions of strong disapproval of his behavior.

To us now the event seems comparatively unimportant. But it was not so regarded at the time, and careful students of history see that but for the undeviating course pursued by Washington, the Republic might have been led to a repudiation of their proclamation of neutrality and to an alliance with France which would have been disastrous for the future of the

TROUBLES WITH ENGLAND.

Added to our difficulties with France came new complications with England. That country seemed determined to drive the United States to resentment and war. She refused to surrender the western ports she had by treaty engagement promised to evacuate. She compelled American vessels entering her ports te pay unreasonable charges and placed excessive duties on imports coming from the United States. She still refused us the right to trade with her West India possessions.

The war between France and the allies increased in intensity. The belligerent powers, in their endeavor to injure each other, violated almost all the accepted rules of international law. Especially were the rights of neutrals disregarded. The allies formed the plan of starving France into submission. In execution of this plan British cruisers were instructed to stop all vessels loaded with food supplies bound to any port in France and to send them "to such ports as shall be most convenient," in order that such food supplied "may be purchased on behalf of his majesty's Government." Against this unwarrantable invasion of our rights the American Government seriously and earnestly protested. We contended that foodstuffs were not "contraband of war." We claimed that a blockade could not be enforced unless there was an actual blockading force out-

On these and other grounds, Jefferson, our Secretary of State, with the entire approval of Washington, vigorously protested against these flagrant violations of American rights. cessions being obtained, he strongly recommended a policy of retaliation. This policy Washington did not approve.

To the already large sum of British violations of our rights was added a new grievance. The British vessels of war were authorized to stop and search all American merchant vessels anywhere on the high seas and "impress" as seamen those whom they claimed were British subjects. The country was outraged at the numerous instances of native Americans being thus virtually made prisoners of war on the pretext that they were English born. Public feeling rose, until March 26, 1794, a temporary embargo was laid forbidding all vessels to depart from American ports.
In the meantime Washington, sadly pained at the evident drift into war, resolved to make another attempt to compose our differences with Great Britain. He determined to send an envoy to Great Britain on a special mission to negotiate a treaty which should secure concessions and thus avert war. In announcing his determination to the Senate he said:

The communication which I have made to you contains a serious aspect of our affairs with Great Britain. But as peace ought to be pursued with unremitted zeal before the last resource, which has too often been the scourge of nations and can not fail to check the advanced prosperity of the United States, is contemplated, I have thought proper to nominate, and do hereby nominate, John Jay as envoy extraordinary of the United States to His Britannic Majesty.

Scarcely any act of the President drew upon his administra-tion a greater degree of censure than this. The feeling of outrage was so great and of resentment so strong that it required all Washington's influence to secure from Senate and House approval even by a narrow margin of his act. Although the President evidently intended to prevent further legislation that might lead to war, nevertheless the nonintercourse act was passed by the House and was only defeated by the casting vote of the Vice President in the Senate. The President was authorized to borrow $2,000,000 on the credit of the United States. Provision was made for increasing the Army and strengthening the Navy

At last even the British ministry seemed to understand that it would not be good policy to drive the United States to become the ally of France and modified some of their offensive orders. Even slight concessions strengthened Washington's The country reluctantly waited the result of Jay's misplan.

There are few acts in our history which show greater force and courage than was displayed by Washington in this crisis. Again he resisted popular opinion. Again he stood against the passionate demand for war which would have resulted fatally for the Republic. All his great influence, all his popularity he jeopardized unhesitatingly in the cause which his judgment dictated and his conscience approved.

After great difficulty Jay at last succeeded in negotiating a treaty with Great Britain. It was far from satisfactory. Hardly contended for were secured. When it any of the concessions contended for were secured. When it reached the United States it proved a disappointment to everybody. The question of its ratification brought about another great crisis in our history. Of this crisis John Quincy Adams said:

It brought on the severest trial which the character of Washington and the fortunes of our country has ever passed through.

A ratification was secured in the Senate by the exact twothirds vote required. When the terms of the treaty became public the whole country was thrown into a ferment of intense excitement. The partisans of France and the enemics of England awoke an overwhelming sentiment against the treaty. Jay was burned in effigy. Hamilton was stoned in his home city when he attempted to defend the treaty and was driven from the stand with blood streaming from his face.

Again nothing but the imperturbable temper of Washington and the hold he had upon the affections and confidence of the people saved the Nation from a repudiation of the treaty and war with Great Britain.

The event justified Washington's position. The treaty had at least the merit which Jay claimed for it, that it was the best that could then be obtained. The embargo proved a failure. Nonintercourse would have been worse and war would have been national suicide. While the treaty failed to secure most of the objects for which the negotiations were instituted it proved of immense benefit to the country. It contained some very valuable provisions. It established a measure of reciprocal trade. It contained our first treaty provision for the extradition of criminals. It sought to ameliorate the harshness of war and make more clear neutral rights. It provided for the settlement of certain differences by arbitration.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

In this brief sketch of the foreign policy of Washington during the first administration of the Government under Constitution I hope I have made plain that its great and underlying feature was the establishment of an American policy of neutrality. That was Washington's steadfast purpose throughout all those troublous years. He became so impressed with the unwisdom of our becoming a party to European politics or engaging in European wars that he was willing to make any personal sacrifice to avoid such supreme danger. In his farewell address that is its central thought. He did not expect we should always be fortunate enough to avoid foreign wars; but if these shall come they should be our wars, not some other nation's wars. [Applause.] To become a party to European struggles would be to mix our interests with theirs, to link our fortunes with theirs, to risk our destiny on the hazard of another's cause. It was against entangling alliances that he warned. It was against any act that might lead this country to become a party to the combinations and struggles for supremacy of the European powers that he admonished.

In his farewell address Washington said:

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Again, he says, referring to our detached and distant situation:

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign grounds? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the tolls of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is urged by influential journals, it is advocated by able men, that it is the duty of the United States to enter the European alliance, and thus become a participant in the present European war. On what grounds can this be urged? To do so would be a violation of our own proclamation of neutrality. President Wilson, following the illustrious example of Washington, at the beginning of the war proclaimed to the world that the United States throughout the struggle will adopt a policy and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial to both the belligerent

To do so would violate Washington's injunction. It would embroil us in the combinations and collisions of the European powers. It would be interweaving our destiny with that of the nations of Europe. It would entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, and caprice. [Applause.]

It should be thoroughly understood just what the proposition is. It is to join the war of the allies, not to make one of our own. Because we have a grievance against one of the powers at war, it is urged we should join in an alliance to make war not only on the offending power but upon all other powers joined Because we may wish to redress our grievance, we should also aid in redressing the grievances of several other nations

To become an ally is not merely to announce that fact. We would be expected to bear our part. We would be expected to make such contribution in men and ships and money as would be commensurate with a rich and powerful nation of 100,000,000 people. Not to do so would excite the enmity of our allies and the contempt of our enemies.

Not only in the field would we be expected to bear our part but, as a consequence, we must become a party to the terms of settlement when the war shall end. That would mean the determination of the dynastic status of every nation of Europe. It would mean the fixing of boundaries. It would mean not only to fix their present status and territorial extent but it would mean an obligation to maintain them inviolate throughout the years to come. The Republic would enter upon the pleasing task of supporting king and czar and emperor against either foreign or supporting king and caar and emperor against either foreign aggression or domestic insurrection. We would thus guarantee the perpetuity of tyranny forever. To enter this alliance and forsake our traditional policy, the policy of Washington, would mean an engagement to keep in order the Balkan States; that we keep Serbia and Roumania and Bulgaria from each other's throats. It would mean that we should become the guardian of the "unspeakable Turk."

Washingtor's inquiry is unanswerable, "Why by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

But it is asked. How can we maintain our neutrality and at the same time protect our rights? The answer is clear. If our rights are invaded, we will redress them ourselves. We do not need to call on others to help. Neither are we under any obligation to help others redress their grievances. It is perfectly legitimate for us to consider our relations with any nation apart entirely from the fact that that nation is engaged in war with other powers. If we shall determine that any nation has given us cause for war, we may so declare. And if we do so declare, we may carry on the war as we shall determine best, regardless of the action of other nations also at war.

If we shall determine that it is not necessary or wise to declare war, but that it is necessary to take active measures to protect the lives and property of our citizens upon the seas, we may arm our merchant ships to defend themselves; we may convoy our merchantmen with vessels of war; we may send fleets of destroyers to clear the seas of piratical submarines.

In either case we would be acting in entire consonance with Washington's and Wilson's proclamations of neutrality. lause.] We would be following the wise counsels of the well Address. Washington was the last man to counsel Farewell Address. supine submission to aggression or imposition. He was careful not to enter either an unjust or a needless war. He declared that "peace ought to be pursued with unremitted zeal." But if there was no other way to maintain the honor or secure the rights and privileges to which his country was entitled, then Washington was for war. [Applause.] Let it not be understood that I am counseling war or acts that may lead to war.

That is to be hereafter determined.

Now, as in Washington's day, "peace ought to be pursued with unremitted zeal." If our difficulties with any nation can be composed honorably by peaceful means, such should be our course. There never has been a war in history in which the rights of neutrals have not been violated. There never will be. The extent to which those violations shall be suffered without resort to war is always a question which should be most carefully considered. That question is the most momentous which a nation is ever called upon to consider. It should not be hastly decided, nor in a spirit of resentment, nor in anger.

The people of the United States do not want war. are not for peace at any price. They are not for peace by the sacrifice of honor; they are not for peace by the surrender of our place among the nations of the world to which we are entitled; they are not for peace that may be secured by a surrender of our indisputable rights. Let not the delusion be indulged that because we deliberate before we act, that because we differ as to when and how we should act, that these are indications either of division or of cowardice. If the supreme call shall come, there will be no hesitation. A united nation will vindicate its rights, and to the uttermost maintain its honor and integrity. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes in harmony with the addresses which have just been made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I have asked for five minutes to speak on a patriotic subject in harmony with the spirit of the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objected, and the Chair can not control Members in their conduct. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count.

Mr. GORDON (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeding for five minutes?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S PATRIOTIC ADDRESS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to place alongside the Farewell Address of George patriotic address of Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, at the unveiling of the monument to Commodore John Barry in the city of Washington, May 16, 1914. President Wilson at that time, and it was before the European war broke out,

"Mr. Secretary, ladies, and gentlemen, I esteem it a privilege to be present on this interesting occasion, and I am very much tempted to anticipate some part of what the orators of the day will say about the character of the great man whose memory we celebrate. If I were to attempt an historical address, I might, however, be led too far afield. I am going to take the liberty, therefore, of drawing a few inferences from the significance of this occasion.

"I think that we can never be present at a ceremony of this kind, which carries our thought back to the great Revolution, by means of which our Government was set up, without feeling that it is an occasion of reminder, of renewal, of refreshment, when we turn our thoughts again to the great issues which were presented to the little Nation which then asserted its independence to the world; to which it spoke both in eloquent representation of its cause and in the sound of arms, and ask ourselves what it was that these men fought for. No one can turn to the career of Commodore Barry without feeling a touch of the enthusiasm with which he devoted an originating mind to the great cause which he intended to serve, and it behooves us, living in this age when no man can question the power of the Nation, when no man would dare to doubt its right and its determination to act for itself, to ask what it was that filled the hearts of these men when they set the Nation up.

"For patriotism, ladies and gentlemen, is in my mind not merely a sentiment. There is a certain effervescence, I suppose, which ought to be permitted to those who allow their hearts to speak in the celebration of the glory and majesty of their country, but the country can have no glory and no majesty unless there be a deep principle and conviction back of the enthusiasm. Patriotism is a principle, not a mere sentiment. No man can be a true patriot who does not feel himself shot through and through with a deep ardor for what his country stands for, what its existence means, what its purpose is declared to be in its history and in its policy. I recall those solemn lines of the poet Tennyson in which he tries to give voice to his conception of what it is that stirs within a nation: 'Some sense of duty, something of a faith, some reverence for the laws ourselves have made, some patient force to change them when we will, some civic manhood firm against the crowd;' steadfastness, clearness of purpose, courage, per-sistency, and that uprightness which comes from the clear thinking of men who wish to serve not themselves, but their fellow men.

"What does the United States stand for, then, that our hearts should be stirred by the memory of the men who set her Constitution up? John Barry fought, like every other man in the Revolution, in order that America might be free to make her own life without interruption or disturbance from any other quarter. You can sum the whole thing up in that, that America had a right to her own self-determined life; and what are our corollaries from that? You do not have to go back to stir your thoughts again with the issues of the Revolution. Some of the issues of the Revolution were not the cause of it, but merely the occasion for it. There are just as vital things stirring now that concern the existence of the Nation as were stirring then, and every man who worthily stands in this presence should examine himself and see whether he has the full conception of what it means that America should live her own life. Washington saw it when he wrote his farewell address. It was not merely because of passing and transient circumstances that Washington said that we must keep free from entangling alliances. It was because he saw that no country had yet set its face in the same direction in which America had set her face. [Applause.] We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way; and in our might and majesty and in the confidence and definiteness of our own purpose we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world. Those who are right, those who study their consciences in determining their policies, those who hold their honor higher than their advantage, do not need alliances. You need alliances when you are not strong, and you are weak only when you are not true to yourself. You are weak only when you are in the wrong; you are weak only when you are afraid to do the right; you are weak only when you doubt your cause and the majesty of a nation's might asserted.

"There is another corollary.

John Barry was an Irishman, but his heart crossed the Atlantic with him. He did not leave it in Ireland. And the test of all of us-for all of us had our origins on the other side of the sea-is whether we will assist in enabling America to live her separate and independent life, retaining our ancient affections, indeed, but determining everything that we do by the interests that exist on this side of Some Americans need hyphens in their names, because only part of them has come over; but when the whole man has come over, heart and thought and all, the hyphen drops of its own weight out of his name. This man was not an Irish-American; he was an Irishman who became an American. [Applause.] I venture to say if he voted he voted with regard to the questions as they looked on this side of the water and not as they affected the other side; and that is my infallible test of a genuine American, that when he votes or when he acts or when he fights his heart and his thought are centered nowhere but in the emotions and the purposes and the policies of the United States. [Applause.]

"This man illustrates for me all the splendid strength which we brought into this country by the magnet of freedom. Men have been drawn to this country by the same thing that has made us love this country—by the opportunity to live their own lives and to think their own thoughts and to let their whole natures expand with the expansion of a free and mighty Nation. We have brought out of the stocks of all the world all the best impulses, and have appropriated them and Americanized them and translated them into the glory and majesty of a great country. "So, ladies and gentlemen, when we go out from this presence we ought to take this idea with us that we, too, are devoted to the purpose of enabling America to live her own life, to be the justest, the most progressive, the most honorable, the most enlightened Nation in the world. Any man that touches our honor is our enemy. Any man who stands in the way of the kind of progress which makes for human freedom can not call himself our friend. Any man who does not feel behind him the whole push and rush and compulsion that filled men's hearts in the time of the Revolution is no American. No man who thinks first of himself and afterwards of his country can call himself an American. America must be enriched by us. We must not live upon her; she must live by means of us.

"I, for one, come to this shrine to renew the impulses of American democracy. I would be ashamed of myself if I went away from this place without realizing again that every bit of self-seeking must be purged from our individual consciences, and that we must be great, if we would be great at all, in the light and illumination of the example of men who gave everything that they were and everything that they had to the glory and honor of America." [Applause.]

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below: S. 7894. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to amend sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the selection of lands for educational purposes in lieu of those appropriated," and to authorize an exchange of lands between the United States and the States of Montana and Wyoming; to the Committee on the Public Lands. S. 1379. An act for the relief of James Gloster; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 18534. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the St. Francis River at or near Parkin, Ark.;

H. R. 19239. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Pearl River, Miss., and the fourth ward of the parish of Washington, La., to construct a bridge across Pearl River, between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La.;

H. R. 14426. An act to amend section 6 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the American National Red Cross," approved

January 5, 1905;

H. R. 12195. An act to amend section 17 of the United States bankruptcy law of July 1, 1898, and amendments thereto of February 5, 1903; and

H. R. 18720. An act permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at Bemidji, in the State of Minnesota.

STEAMER "CHARLES L. HUTCHINSON."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration the bill (S. 8252) to authorize the change of name of the steamer Charles L. Hutchinson to Fayette This bill has passed the Senate and was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and has been favorably reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 8252. Is there objection? Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the mortgagee or the trustee consented?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed, upon application of the owner, the Brown Transit Co., of Mentor, Lake County, Ohio, to change the name of the steamer Charles L. Hutchinson (official No. 207345) to the Fayette

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CONFERENCE REPORT, PAYMENT OF FINDINGS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (S. 1878) making appropriations for the payment of findings of the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. MANN. The report is very short.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Very well.

The Clerk read the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the Clerk is reading from, but it certainly was not the report of the managers on the part of the House. He is reading from some printed paper of some kind, but that was not the report. Now, when they come to enroll this bill the clerk on enrolled bills can not take that paper which the Clerk read in order to enroll the bill, and it is the duty of the reading clerk to protect the House in these matters. If the report of the managers of the conference on the part of the House is not in the Clerk's hands, we ought to know it. If it is, it should have been read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from South Carolina where is that report?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can say it was filed, and, of course, filed before it was printed. I sent to the desk the printed report to save time. The original ought to be on the Speaker's desk. It was certainly filed or else it could not have been printed.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have no doubt it was filed, but they can not take the printed copy, and I want to know where the original copy is.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is with those papers there.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk says it is not up here.

Mr. MANN. We can not act on the conference report without having it.

The SPEAKER. Of course that is true. Will the gentleman withdraw his conference report temporarily and hunt up the

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the report, but it is impossible for us to hunt it up. There is no question about it having been filed, else it could not have been printed, and it is printed. I will withdraw the request for consideration at this time and let the Clerk hunt it up.

The SPEAKER. The chances are by some misadventure the Printing Office did not send it back.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker-

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?
Mr. BAILEY. To ask permission to extend my remarks in the Record by printing some letters, resolutions, and telegrams which I have received in regard to war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20783. a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20783, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. Saunders in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20783) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there are some amendments pending to the last paragraph that were read, I think, but there was one amendment passed over in reference to the Georgia encamp-

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. MANN. Just a moment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Hull of Iowa

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of the other amendment if we can. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, at the end of line 9, insert:

"Provided, That the sum appropriated by section 1661, Revised Statutes, for arming and equipping the whole body of the millita, the sum of $14,409.98, proportioned to the State of Georgia for the years 1915 and 1916, be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available for the purpose of paying the expenses incurred by said State over and above the allotments made by the Secretary of War to the State of Georgia from all appropriations therefor in connection with the joint encampment held at Augusta, Ga., July 22 to 31, 1914, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and instructed to pay over said amount to the governor of said State of Georgia for said purpose."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry about that as to the form. This amendment offered is the bill introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Howard].

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It says "that the sum appropriated," and so forth, "of $14,000." I think it should be "from the sum appropriated by section 1661 the sum of $14,000 is appropriated."

Mr. DENT. I accept that amendment.
Mr. MANN. Now, this is "proportioned to the State of Georgia for the years 1915 and 1916." Of course, that was the fiscal year that ended June 30 last. Whether the money has been used or not, I do not know.

Mr. DENT. The information the committee has is that this money is in the possession of the Militia Bureau now and has been held for this purpose, awaiting the authority of Congress to dispose of it. It is on hand now.

Mr. MANN. If they have retained the money it covers the

Mr. DENT. I asked for that information myself before I agreed to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. This language was inserted in a bill introduced a year or two years ago.

Mr. DENT. That is the information they furnished the committee

Mr. MANN. Now, if I may get the attention of the gentleman, I wish to say that the Senate passed a bill (S. 5767) entitled "An act for the relief of Frank Carpenter." The House Committee on Claims has reported it favorably to the House. It provided for the payment of $812.60 as full settlement of the amount due this man for services and team hire in 1910 and 1911 in connection with the construction of the Oklahoma State rifle range, at Chandler, Okla., and the report shows that this work was done by the man, and that his accounts were approved in connection with the construction of the rifle range in Oklahoma, and, I suppose, in connection with the encampment, although I do not know, the cost of which construction was paid out of this fund apportioned under section 1661 of the Revised Statutes; but that when his claim came to be audited, while it was approved, there was not sufficient money in the apportionment to the State of Oklahoma to pay it, though it should have been paid. I do not know anything more about the claim. Now, the Committee on Claims has reported that it should be paid out of the General Treasury. Well, I do not think where a State has money apportioned to it under section 1661, and then incurs obligations, that we should give them an extra sum of money for paying those claims out of the Treasury, but that we should charge it up to them out of funds which are apportioned to them another year. And will not the gentleman agree with me?

Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman. I think it ought to be paid out of this fund. Otherwise, Oklahoma would get a larger sum than any other State.

Mr. MANN. I drafted an amendment, because I would not be willing to let this other bill pass and pay it out of the general fund, providing the $812.60 may be taken out of the fund apportioned for the years 1916 and 1917, that being this fiscal year, to pay this claim, by turning it over to the governor of Oklahoma for that purpose.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that amendment. Will the gentleman offer it?

Mr. MANN. I will offer it right away after this, if I may. I think the amendment of the gentleman there should read "that from the sum apportioned." Otherwise it does not make

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the word indicated will be inserted. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may offer an amendment to follow the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Mann: "That from the sum appropriated by section 1661 of the Revised Statutes for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia the sum of $812.60 out of the sum proportioned to the State of Oklahoma for the year 1916-17 be, and the same is hereby, made available for the purpose of paying the expenses incurred by said State over and above the allotments made by the Secretary of War to the State of Oklahoma from the appropriation therefor in connection with the construction of the State rifle range at Chandler or the encampment held at Oklahoma in the year 1910-11; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay over said amount to the governor of the said State of Oklahoma for said purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Hull of Iowa: Page 58, line 9, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$6,200,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Is there not an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in lieu thereof the following: Strike out "$6,200,000" and insert "$4,000,000."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to accept that amendment as mine.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amending amendment will be accepted, so that the original amendment will read as the Clerk will indicate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$6,200,000" and insert "$4,000,000."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded in 25 minutes

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate to whom he wishes that time to be given?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to ob-

Mr. DENT. Five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsyl-[Mr. Crago], five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland], and five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull].

The CHAIRMAN. That makes 20 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Twenty-five minutes. I ask for five minutes for myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall terminate at the expiration of 25 minutes, the time to be divided as has been formally agreed upon and indicated to the Chair. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAGO Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, we federalized, as we said, the National Guard, and we provided in that act that the National Guard must have each year 15 days at least of field training.

Now, the first year after we pass that act we come back here and fail to appropriate sufficient funds to provide that training for the National Guard. In other words, the National Government took upon itself the matter of the maneuver camps for the National Guard, and now we refuse to appropriate the money. The testimony before the committee, as will be found on page 1120, is to the effect that while the appropriation last year was only $500,000, none of it was used, owing to the fact that the National Guard troops were on the border. This year it is estimated that at least 75 per cent of those troops will have come back from the border in plenty of time to take part in these maneuver camps.

Now, in estimating for this, $600,000 was provided for the transportation of the Army participating in these maneuvers. I take it that the greater part of that sum can be deducted from the estimate furnished by the department; also, I would and I have fixed upon the amount appropriated here in the light of that suggestion-that the camps of instruction for the officers of the National Guard, which are held in every State where they are asked for, be combined with the camps for maneuvers; in other words, that during these 15 days' time the schooling for the officers of the National Guard be combined with the maneuver movements.

This would do away with the necessity of that expense, and I believe that it would lessen the amount necessary by at least $1,000,000. So I have provided, by taking from the amount the travel pay and expenses of the Army and the expenses of the instruction camps for the officers, for $4,000,000 to be expended in these maneuver camps.

Now, there is nothing more necessary than this field instruction, and whether we regard the National Guard as the real second line of defense or not, it is all we have in the second line. Therefore let us not make a mockery out of this so-called fed-

Therefore let us not make a mockery out of this so-called federalization of the guard by withholding from them the funds necessary to properly train them. [Applause.]

Now, it is said these men have been on the border for three or four or five months. That is just the reason why we need these maneuver camps this year. This is providing for the maneuver camps for this summer. These men, many of them, have had their fill of military experience, but when it is announced that they will have these maneuver camps, you will find their that they will have these maneuver camps, you will find their interest revived. They will want to go back to these maneuver camps and meet the boys they served with on the border, and you can do nothing better for the benefit of the National Guard than to provide lavishly for these camps during the coming year. [Applause.]
Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. My colleague will recall that we have appropriated as much as $2,500,000 in alternate years for this very purpose?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. That was supplemented by the appropriations made by the different States for their State encamp-

Now, I fear that some of the States will refuse to make an appropriation this year, and it should be possible for us to make here an appropriation which will enable every organization of the National Guard of any State which wishes to take part in these maneuver encampments to do so for the full 15 days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item for the training of the National Guard I want to discuss for a minute or two the question of military training in itself.

I have listened in this debate particularly, and in preceding debates on military bills, to attacks upon the Army of the United States, that it is un-American, that it ought in some way to be reorganized, that there is too great a chasm between the officers and the men, and so on. It has been gradually impressed upon my mind that possibly the whole system of a paid standing Army is un-American. If there is any such thing as a pure American system of defense, it rests upon the constitutional militia, which embraces every able-bodied man between 18 and 45 years of age.

I can not bring myself to believe as a practical propositionand I was born in a town which contains the largest Army post in the United States, and I grew up there from boyhood, at Fort Leavenworth—I can not believe that we can ever in times of peace and prosperity in this country employ enough men to maintain an effective fighting force. If I did believe that it were possible to employ them, I doubt the wisdom of our expending the money necessary, in competition with the attractions of private life, to employ that body of men. If I did not doubt the wisdom of that, I would still doubt the democracy of a system which would employ mercenary soldiers, professional soldiers, to guard the liberties of the people. If I had no other fear of mercenary soldiers, history would teach me that it is the mercenary army upon which despotism always relies.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BORLAND. I do not want to extend my time, and I do not want to extend the discussion.

In my judgment one of the safeguards to liberty in the early days of our country was that practically every man, every householder, was trained to arms in that day and was a defensive force. I remember in our western frontier every householder was called upon to protect the frontier against the then constant enemy-the savage of the plains. When the war with Great Britain in 1812 broke out the last frontier post was in central Missouri. All the Northwest was inflamed by the British agents against American posts, and word was sent to old Col. Cooper to bring his settlers into St. Louis, where they could be protected by mercenary soldiers. He said: "We have enough men and boys here to protect our settlement." Every boy over 17 years of age mounted guard over the little fort that we had there. If there is an American system, that is the American system.

Now, I do not believe we can ever as a practical proposition maintain a mercenary force or standing army which shall be American in every particular. I have heard gentlemen say that there ought to be more democracy in this paid force of ours. I have seen it; I grew up with it. There is no such thing possible. There is no such thing as democracy in a paid army. But if every man had a sufficient military training, not only would be feel that the safeguards and liberties of the country were in his own hands, but there would not be the chasm between the officers and the men that there is now.

I would like to see the son of the millionaire and the son of the plowman serving side by side for the protection of their common country. [Applause.] I can not think of any military system being American except that. I am not prepared at this time to discuss the practical details of such a plan, but I clearly see in this debate a tendency toward a plan of that kind. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment, and I am in favor of it because I fear that the committee have gone too far on the back swing of the pendu-Last year we came here with the preparedness bill, which provided for certain organizations, and we appropriated money to maintain and support those organizations. we are in effect tearing up the legislation that we put on the it is a shame, that this Congress, composed of the same men, should go before the people of this country and say, "We have statute books in the last session of this Congress. It is pitiful, passed an Army bill that prepares this country," and then, after the election, come back to the Halls of this Congress and cut off the supplies that would support the organization that we have provided. If you are going to depend upon the National Guard, the National Guard must be supported. The National Guard must be trained, and the greatest training that they can have is in these annual training encampments.

Now, what does this appropriation as the committee has reported it carry? It carries $1,000,000, which will not even pay the cost of the food that these men will consume in such an encampment. The men who are now enlisted, who are now under arms, under a law that we have passed, should be supported. They must be paid, or else you must tear up the national-defense act. They must be transported, or else you must tear up the national-defense act. If you do not take care of the National Guard, there is only one thing left for you to do, and that is to adopt the universal-training proposition and send them all, whether they are National Guardsmen or not, somewhere in this country to be trained, or else you have got to say to the people of this country, "We do not propose that we shall have an armed land force to protect the country." So I say, therefore, gentlemen, that it is necessary that this increase be granted, and I hope that the $4,000,000 will be authorized.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DENT. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull] to use his time, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment is simply to provide the money for the summer maneuvers of the National Guard. As has been called to your attention by the gentleman from New York, the amount that the committee have recommended would not pay for the food that the National Guard as it is enlisted to-day would consume if it goes into a summer camp.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think this little trip from which the National Guard are just returning, down on the border, lasting eight months, is pretty nearly enough maneuvering for one year?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; it is not enough. That was hard work, and it was not the proper training. The National Guard from Iowa were not properly trained. They were not properly provided with equipment to train.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.
Mr. ANDERSON. I just want to suggest to the gentleman that next year the National Guard will be an entirely different organization from the National Guard that went to Mexico last

Mr. GORDON. It will be the same men, though,

Mr. GORDON. It will be the same men, though.
Mr. ANDERSON. No.
Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is absolutely right. If you are going to have a National Guard a year from now, you must provide the money for the summer maneuvers this summer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not very likely that, judging by past experience, the next coming maneuvers would show a greater improvement, by reason of the experience on the border that the National Guard have had, than any preceding maneuvers could have shown?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman is right; and the guard coming back at this time need this encouragement in order to enlist their full strength. There will be some who will not re-enlist as they come back.

Now, the committee have been criticized a great deal for not taking up with some other plan in regard to your Army. I call the attention of the House to this, that in case we fail to make this appropriation we will not have any army for a year or so. The National Guard is the line of defense upon which we have got to depend for the next year. There is no other line of defense. Under the committee plan the National Guard would disintegrate. There has been a great deal of complaint against the Regular Army for the way they have treated the National I hope this House will not take such action that it will lay itself liable to the same criticism that is being leveled against the Regular Army, that it is unfriendly to the National Guard. We ourselves created the National Guard a year ago, and it is our duty to support it. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left? The CHAIRMAN. With the time that has been returned the gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I should like two or three minutes, if I can have it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield back any time that I may have. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman can have that. Mr. DENT. I had promised to give to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Fields] the time yielded back to me. Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If some member of the committee is asking for time, I certainly will not.

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Two or three minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Perhaps I can get through in three minutes. will try to do so.

Mr. DENT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I did not agree with the committee, in the framing of the national-defense act, that the National Guard, composed of the State militia, should be the second line of defense of this country; but the committee adopted that plan, and the Congress ratified the action of the committee. Therefore, at this time the National Guard, based upon our State militia, is our second line of defense, and I believe it is unwise to handicap that organization in any way that will make it inefficient. While I am not in sympathy with the ideas of those who believe it is the proper second line of defense, I want to be fair with it, I propose to be fair with it, and I want to give it every advantage that can be had. It has been well said that there will be many changes in the personnel of the National Guard within the next year, and the new recruits should be trained.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FIELDS. I can not yield, in three minutes. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FIELDS. It may be well to keep alive the training that these men have received on the border. If it goes over until another year, much of the interest will be lost, and I think it is only the part of good business to keep alive the instructions that these men have received on the border and to keep alive the enthusiasm they have. For that reason I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining? The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine and a half

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman from Minnesota be willing to accept two minutes?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I shall have to. Mr. DENT. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire an opportunity to state that I am heartily in favor of the amendment that has been proposed, largely for the reasons that have already been advanced. I say that, as one heartily in favor of universal military training, I am willing to support that kind of a proposition anywhere; but I know that universal military training will never come to the relief of this country for several years, however much I would like to have it now. The time of the emergency is now and not 5 or 10 or 15 years hence.

The National Guard of the respective States, on the whole, is a splendid organization. I wish to God it was ten times as numerous, and then we would not need such a thing as universal military training. I think it is safe to say that the field maneuvers with the Regular Army each year have been of more value to them in the matter of training than all of the rest of the training in their respective armories. I do not know what actuated the committee in cutting down the appropriation to $1,000,000. I know that a million dollars will not permit the National Guard of the States to take part in the maneuvers for the ensuing year. I think it is of the highest importance that they be given a sufficient appropriation to do that all over the country. I think it is generally agreed that $4,000,000 is no more than sufficient to accomplish that purpose. So, Mr. Chairman, speaking as one who believes in universal training, who does not believe in a great standing Army, I strongly and firmly believe that we are serving our country wisely if we increase this appropriation to the extent asked for.

The National Guard of the respective States we have found much criticized for their inefficiency during the recent months. However true that may be in some organizations, I do not believe that criticism is good when applied to the majority of them. As near as I can determine by such investigation as I have been able to make, the National Guard of many States ranks very high when brought to the test in the field. I have heard many Army officers who went at my request to the Texas border in their respective vicinities to look over the National Guardsmen

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. MILLER of Minnesota, I ask a minute to complete this sentence The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. These Regular Army officers, to a man, said that they had never seen a finer personnel than they found in many of the National Guard organizations; that the personnel of our National Guard of enlisted men is higher and better than in the Regular Army. That, naturally, would be true. Usually they are the best blood in their respective communities. They have ideals back of them, and they are there for a patriotic purpose; and I believe that every consideration and every assistance this Government can extend to them in their self-sacrifice and endeavors to be the guardians of our liberty and the guardians of the country should be given them, and that means an increase in this appropriation.

[Applause,]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have been a member of the Military Committee of the House, and my service began in the Sixty-first Congress, it has been the policy of the Military Committee to give an appropriation for joint maneuvers of the National Guard and the Regular Army every alternate year. The largest appropriation that we have ever made for that purpose as asked for by the department was $1,250,000. It may cost a little more under the national-defense act to have these joint maneuvers now. The department comes to the committee at this time and asks for the enormous increase of over $6,000,000 for the purpose of having joint maneuvers the coming summer. The committee, or a majority of the committee, reached the conclusion—and there was no minority report filed that practically all of the Organized Militia and National Guard of the United States has had something like six months' service on the border in connection with the Regular troops, and that that six months' service down there was a great deal better and of more assistance and education to them than the joint maneuvers with the Regular Army. The committee therefore deemed it unwise to ask the National Guard when it returns from the Mexican border to go into joint maneuvers with the Regular Army. We made an allowance of $1,000,000 on the theory that perhaps the Regular Army would be engaged in maneuvers at some post and that near that post there would be certain organizations of the National Guard or an organization of militia that could reach this place easily and without any great expense participate in maneuvers with the Regular Army, and for that reason we made the appropriation of $1,000,000.

As I said, the policy of the committee has been to have the general maneuvers only every other year, one year for the National Guard and the other for the Coast Artillery. We ap-propriated $350,000 for the joint maneuvers of the Coast Artillery. I think the committee has been perfectly fair and very liberal with the National Guard in making the appropriation this year of $1,000,000, and I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let me ask the gentleman, was it not agreed among the members of the committee that while there was no minority report each member should feel at liberty to offer an amendment up to the amount requested by the War Department?

Mr. DENT. I do not recollect any such agreement. I know the gentleman from New York is not bound, because he was not there when it was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if a new rule has been adopted by the members of the Military Affairs Committee under which they do not intend to stand by the report of the committee on the bill brought into the House, but that each member is privileged to attack it and offer amendments as he sees fit?

Mr. DENT. I do not know of any such rule. Some members have the right to offer an amendment on some items, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Crago] was one of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. HULL of Iowa) there were—ayes 41, noes 42.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that the ayes were 54 and the nays were 56.

Mr. CALDWELL. I make the point of no quorum. The CHAIRMAN. The vote shows that 110 Members are present, and the Chair noticed other Members in the House who did not vote. A quorum is present.

So the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That of this sum so much thereof as may be necessary is authorized to be expended for the payment of transportation of troops of the Regular Army in connection with joint camps of instruction of the National Guard: Provided, That of this sum as much thereof as may be necessary is authorized to be expended for the pay, transportation, and subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard Reserve as may be authorized by the Secretary of War under the law to attend encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises of the National Guard.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In discussing this bill the other day, page 3940 of the Record, the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Len-ROOT] used this language:

Mr. Chalrman, in the present crisis with Germany I have felt that the best service a Member of Congress could render his country was to refrain from discussing the matter on the floor until we were called upon to take some action. Unfortunately that has not been done, and extremists on both sides have been freely expressing their opinions, until there is a very general belief throughout the country that if Congress is called upon to act at all it will choose between a general declaration of war against Germany, intervening in the European war, and a position that, whatever the provocation may be, we will under no circumstances defend our rights with force.

The fact is that many gentlemen had not spoken, but the form employed is the usual one of the gentleman from Wisconsin, especially whenever he speaks from a carefully prepared manuscript in answer to an adversary who has suddenly driven him to speech.

On March 7, 1916, page 3699 of the RECORD, the distinguished minority leader, Mr. MANN, submitted what would constitute an amendment to be offered to the then pending McLemore resolution whenever the parliamentary situation admitted, the matter having to do with warning American citizens from taking passage on certain vessels. From such amendment so to be offered I quote:

That in the opinion of the House of Representatives citizens of the United States, under existing conditions and irrespective of their legal rights, ought to refrain from taking (such) passage.

On the same day, March 7, 1916, page 3709 of the Record, Mr. Lenboot, speaking to the House, indulged the hope that the amendment suggested by Mr. Mann would be in order, thereby, as the gentleman from Wisconsin said, to give "the House opportunity to vote for a simple resolution of warning." The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner,], then as always manifesting his displeasure with any effort calculated to pour oil on the troubled waters, provoked Mr. Lenroot to the following language:

The gentleman from Massachusetts usually is one of the bravest and most courageous men in this House, but in the attitude that he takes to-day upon this resolution the gentleman subjects himself to the charge of cowardice.

On Sunday, December 24, 1916, in an interview given by Mr. Gardner to the press associations of the country, he used the following language:

I have read the indorsement which the leader of my party in Congress gave yesterday to President Wilson's offer of interference in European affairs. This is the fourth or fifth time that Leader Mann has given encouragement to the Kaiser's wicked cause. As far as I am concerned, I will tolerate such leadership no longer. I believe that the happiness of the world requires the destruction of the dynasties of the Hapsburgs and Hohenzollerns. For that reason I shall support Representative Lenroot, of Wisconsin, for Speaker when the next Congress convenes.

Then, again, in Mr. Lenroot's speech the other day, and subsequent to Mr. Gardner's Speakership declaration, he used this language:

Mr. Chairman, when the contest upon the McLemore resolution arose last year I was against the President, because I believed he was wrong, because I was unwilling to commit myself to the use of force to maintain what the President had himself denominated a doubtful legal right. I never will vote to use force to maintain a doubtful legal right; but there is no doubt about the question involved in this crists

What I desire to call the attention of the committee to is that when the McLemore resolution was pending Mr. Lenroot, in the interest of the general peace vote of his country, urged that American citizens should forego some privileges, spective of their legal rights." His present attitude provokes Mr. GARDNER to no criticism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman then was willing to vote for a resolution to warn men to keep off vessels because there was in such conduct danger to the peace of the country. To-day he says quite to the contrary. the friend of the gentleman from Massachusetts to-day. To-day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is his friend. I know not what has taken place, but I do know that there has been an evolution in the thoughts of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot], and he has changed from the peace advocate and the champion of the people and has become now what Mr. GARDNER is, and we all know where Mr. GARDNER stands on the principal question before the country.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] further observed in his speech that he is against the referendum, asserting that "the proposition for a war referendum is a great peril." Mr. Lenroot came to Congress as one of the great reformers in this country, as one of the great Wisconsin reformers, where the referendum and the initiative and all things that are good in this country had their origin. He would allow men to vote on whether they should have prohibition, he would allow men to vote on whether they should take a certain medicine, he would allow the referendum upon everything that would affect men in peaceful pursuits; but when the waging of war is on trial, when we are to determine whether Americans shall go into a foreign war, then he wraps his cloak of wisdom about him and says that he alone of all the people who live in his district in Wisconsin possesses the necessary courage and discernment to determine whether men shall shed their blood in a foreign war. I submit that in the evolution of the gentleman he has gone over to where Mr. Gardner stands, and in the name of the American people I resent his present attitude and deny that he has the right longer to speak for the plain American man in the Congress or anywhere else. There will be a referendum in the gentleman's district all too soon for his political comfort, and he will not find it so easy to explain to the peace-loving folks at home as it has been for him to go over to the standard of his new friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts.

In closing I desire to say this: The American people are not for war, and there is not going to be any war; it does not matter who may be for war. Mr. Gardner may have always been for war, and I do not say that he has been or is, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] may have joined him, and that admits of no doubt, still I say that Mr. Gardner's steadfastness and Mr. Lenroot's present devotion will make no difference. It does not matter what they say nor what they do, nor how they stand, the American people are not going to tolerate a declaration of war. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for the attendance of selected officers or enlisted men of the National Guard who pursue a regular course of study at any military service school of the United States, except the United States Military Academy, or to be attached to an organization of the same arm, corps, or department to which such officers or enlisted men shall belong, for routine practical instruction at or near an Army post during a period of field training or other outdoor exercises; and such officers or enlisted men shall receive, out of any National Guard allotment of funds available for the purpose, the same travel allowances and quarters or commutation of quarters, and the same pay, allowance, and subsistence to which officers or enlisted men of the Regular Army would be entitled for attending such school, college, or practical course of instruction under orders from proper military authority while in actual attendance at such school, college, or practical course of instruction. Provided, That in no case shall the pay and allowances authorized herein exceed those of a captain, $150,000.

Mr. Chairman, a bill for compulsory military training will be offered to this House to-day, but it can receive no serious consideration until Congress reconvenes.

desire to express certain views on this subject.

Military discipline does not consist in learning to maintain a straight line in marching, nor in thumping the armory floor with your rifle butt in unison with your neighbors. All that sort of thing is military drill, not military discipline. seen a company of young women on the stage who could maintain a perfect alignment and give an exhibtion drill which would make you marvel, but I have a good deal of doubt whether their minds had been trained to that obedience which prevents the disintegration of armies exposed to hunger and thirst and cold and heat, and holds human nature in check during the awful ordeal of battle.

Military experts tell us that in every regiment there is a percentage of cowards and a percentage of men for whom danger has no terrors; but that the mass is neither cowardly nor heroic. If well led and thoroughly disciplined, it will perform prodigies of valor. If badly led or undisciplined, it will shame itself. The strongest instinct known to man is the instinct of self-preservation. The bulwark of discipline, the fear of officer or comrade is needed for the restraint of that instinct.

If plenty of skillful officers and noncommissioned officers are available, unquestionably the average American boy can be rapidly taught to shoot, to drill, to look after his health, and to take care of his rifle. The throwing of bombs, the handling of machine guns, the use of the bayonet, and the taking of trenches must also be taught if the soldier is to be fitted to compete in modern warfare. All these things take time; but the learning of the lesson of obedience and subordination takes more time than all the rest.

Most of us hate to obey even more than we hate to work and yet I believe that every one of us ought to be given a good, stiff dose of obedience for a full year of our lives. I do not mean that the obedience of the factory or the obedience of the school or even of the home. I mean real subordination for 24 hours a day, such as the West Point cadet is subjected to. course, I am quite aware that many good people believe that to require implicit unreasoning obedience breaks a boy's will. Well, if any fond mother dreads the effect of military discipline on her boy's will, let her take comfort in the thought that Ulysses S. Grant and William T. Sherman and Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson were taught subordination at West Point and yet their will power seemed to survive.

For a good while past we have been going on the theory that three years' service in the National Guard in time of peace qualifies a young man to be rated as a trained soldier. Last year, by the terms of the national-defense act, we incorporated the National Guard into our first line of defense, and we provided for raising 440,000 guardsmen in the succeeding We are not getting along very fast. We had about 120,000 National Guardsmen on paper when the national-defense act was passed. We have about 150,000 to-day. If it had not been for the call for border service, I doubt whether we should have even the 120,000 men with which we started.

Under the terms of the national-defense act a National Guardsman must serve three years with the colors and then, for three years more, he must be ready, as a reservist, to serve in the first line in case of war. During the three years of a guardsman's active service the amount of training prescribed for him by law is only 192 hours per year, or 576 hours during the entire period. When the three years have expired the guardsman is supposed to be a trained soldier. Contrast this view of the case with the view held by other nations. Instead of only 576 hours of training, the Japanese or the German or the French boy before he is considered qualified as a soldier must in time of peace receive approximately 4,000 hours of intensive military training spread over a period of two years. (See p. 8, Report of Chief of Staff, U. S. A., Sept. 30, 1916.)

My figure as to the training required of our National Guard is taken from the testimony of Maj. Gen. Hugh L. Scott, Chief of Staff, before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, December 18, 1916. Military men who have recently been in Europe tell me that the period of training for a British recruit is now six months in England before he is sent to the Continent. Then follows a period of training behind the lines. The length of this period varies according to the military necessities. Unless circumstances make it absolutely impossible, the British aim to give each recruit a full year's training before sending him into the first-line trenches.

I know, of course, that Gen. Wood is of the opinion that American boys after six months of intensive training can be depended on as qualified infantrymen. Unless I am very much mistaken, Army opinion in general seriously disputes this view of the general's. No one denies the wonderful results accomplished at Plattsburg by Gen. Wood's system of intensive military training. It would be a mistake, however, to forget that the Plattsburg recruits were serious-minded, mature men, who attended the camp of instruction for the purpose of absorbing as much military training as could possibly be given them in the limited period at their disposal. Under a compulsory system, on the other hand, our young men, just like all other young men who ever were born, would look upon their military training as a rather irksome necessity which was to be performed with reasonable fidelity and something a little better than the minimum of effort.

I remember very well when I was at college that there were certain astute students and graduates who made a business of tutoring us idlers in preparation for the examinations. I myself was guilty of neglecting one of my courses in political economy throughout a large part of the year. In the last week before the annual examinations, along with a drove of other young reprobates, I was so admirably coached by an expert that I had no difficulty in passing my examination with a reasonably satisfactory mark. A fortnight later all the knowledge which had been crowded into me with so much rapidity had taken to itself wings and flown away.

It seems to be an undoubted peculiarity of human nature that those things which a man learns rapidly he forgets rapidly, whereas those things which are taught gradually he remembers throughout his life. There is no royal road to knowledge; neither can training be administered in capsule form. Much as I dislike to align myself on the side opposite to Gen. Wood, it seems to me that those officers who believe in an entire year's compulsory military training have the better of the argument.

I understand, of course, that in many a war soldiers have been marched into battle with far less training than is thought necessary to-day. If we go far enough back in history, we shall probably find that the young cave dweller was fitted for warfare in the length of time which it took him to gather a sufficient supply of stones. When siege artillery consisted of catapults and manganels, an ordnance officer was not obliged to spend long years in studying the chemistry of high explosives, nor was the artilleryman's brain sprained by problems in ballistics. Once upon a time men exercised simultaneously the trade of barber and the trade of surgeon, and in those days it did not take three years in a medical school and several more in a hospital before a young man was thought qualified to perform a major operation.

But surgery and warfare have become complicated and the old simple training will not answer for either any longer. Furthermore, in these days of steam heat and trolley cars and elevators, it may well be doubted whether the American boy who enlisted last summer was physically in such good condition for hard work as was that boy's grandfather when he enlisted in the Civil War over 50 years ago.

A few days after election in November last, I started for the Mexican border with two objects in view: First, to study the relations of the National Guard with the Regular Army; and, second, to endeavor to ascertain the causes of the disinclination of young men to enlist.

I found that on October 7, 1916, an order had been issued from the headquarters of the Department of the South directing all Regular officers serving as inspector-instructors with the National Guard to make a report on the virtues or defects of the National Guard system. I found that the reports made in compliance with this order were almost invariably exceedingly unfavorable to the National Guard system. Of course, I realized that Regular Army officers are human and that we must expect from them a certain amount of impatience at the fulsome laudation which we politicians so freely bestow on the National Guardsman who votes and so churlishly withhold from the Regular Army man who bears the brunt of battle. But no amount of irritation or prejudice or jealousy or intrigue or of all these things combined could account for the unanimity of the replies to Gen. Funston's circular order of October 7. I can not find that these replies have ever been published, but the report on the mobilization of the National Guard, issued by the War Department, tells exactly the same story of the inefficiency of all except a few National Guard organizations.

Realizing as I did that the generalissimos of the National Guard would let loose a storm of criticism of the Regular Army as soon as the mobilization reports were published, I approached Gen. George Bell, commanding the district of El Paso, and discussed with him a plan for ascertaining the views of the National Guard toward the Regular Army. The views of the generalissimos I already knew. What I was seeking was the opinion of the junior officers and enlisted men of the National Guard.

There were at that time 16 National Guard regiments, 4 separate squadrons or battalions, and 296 companies, batteries, and sanitary units under the command of Gen. Bell. The plan was hit upon of sending a list of questions to each of the 20 officers in command of regiments, separate squadrons or battalions, and to each of the 296 captains commanding companies, and so forth. In order to get the point of view of the enlisted men as well as of the commissioned officers, the same list of questions was sent to the 296 first sergeants of the aforementioned companies, and so forth. Ordinarily when subordinates make reports they are required to forward them through "military channels" as it is called. That is to say, a first sergeant makes his report to his captain, who indorses it and forwards it to Thereupon the colonel indorses the report and forwards it to the brigade commander, who in his turn forwards it to the division or district commander. In other words, under ordinary circumstances the report of a first sergeant in the El Paso district would pass under the supervision of three different commissioned officers before it reached Gen. Bell's headquarters. In this particular case, however, Gen. Bell gave orders that all reports were to be made to him direct, and it was tacitly understood that the names of the signers should be confidential. Furthermore, directions were given that each man should make his report without consultation with anyone else.

Here is Gen. Bell's order:

HEADQUARTERS EL PASO DISTRICT,
El Paso, Tex., December 13, 1916.

1. The following questions will be answered by each regimental commander, company commander, and first sergeant of the National Guard.
2. The answers will be written with a typewriter or pencil and the completed paper will then be sealed in an official envelope and mailed without delay direct to the "Commanding General, El Paso District, Mills Building, El Paso, Tex."

3. The district commander desires that each man called upon for port express his opinions without consultation with anyone.

By command of Brig. Gen. Bell:

H. H. WHITNEY, Lieutenant Colonel, Adjutant General, District Adjutant.

Here are the questions and answers:

No. 1. Question. Would the instruction of the National Guard proceed more rapidly if more Regular officers and noncommissioned officers were detailed for service with the National Gnard?

Answer. Yes: Colonels, 18; captains, 190; first sergeants, 180; total yes, 388. No: Colonels, none; captains, 41; first sergeants, 53; total no, 94. Conditional: Colonels, 2; captains, 50; first sergeants, 38; total conditional, 90.

Note.—The noes were qualified in about half of the replies by the statement that there were "already enough," meaning that one regular officer and three regular noncommissioned officers, as at present detailed for the instruction of each regiment, were ample.

No. 2. Question. Are the officers and enlisted men of the National Guard desirous of the instruction from the officers and noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army? If not, what is the reason?

Answer. Yes: Colonels, 16; captains, 217; first sergeants, 205; total yes, 438. No: Colonels, none; captains, 12; first sergeants, 30; total no, 42. Conditional: Colonels, 4; captains, 49; first sergeants, 17; total conditional, 70.

No. 3. Question. Can you suggest any way in which the officers and men of the Regular Army cooperate more fully with the National Guard in the development of a citizen army?

Answer. The answers to this question may be roughly classified as follows: More cooperation by friendly intercourse and a closer relationship, 122; more careful selection of Regular Army instructors, 28; more instruction from Regular Army, particularly at home stations, 83; sundry suggestions, 50.

Note.—Over 70 replies to question No. 3 desired one Regular officer with each regiment or separate battalion and one noncommissioned officer with each company instead of only three for the whole regiment.

No. 4. Question. Have you formed any opinion on the question of universal military training? If so, what are your ideas? Answer. In favor: Colonels, 16; captains, 250; first sergeants, 234; total yes, 500. Against: Colonel, 1; captains, 5; first sergeants, 4; total no, 10.

No. 5. Any additional remarks you may have to make bearing on the above. Many of these remarks are most valuable. They will be made a subject of special study at Gen. Bell's

I have here all the original 572 replies to Gen. Bell's order. They were tabulated by the officers at his headquarters and I have given you the tabulation figures. If any member of the committee wishes to do any tabulation on his own account he is welcome to do so; but I request that the names of the signers may be held confidential.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for pay and allowances of officers of the National Guard assigned to duty in the Militia Bureau, $12,000.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, evidences of the patriotic loyalty of the industrial concerns of this country are multiplying daily, and in this connection I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a resolution adopted by the Manufacturers' Club of Sandusky County, Ohio, and at the close of the reading I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the principal European countries are involved in the greatest war the world has ever known, and said strife is seriously interfering with the rights and liberties of our country and countrymen; and Whereas our President has during the continuance of this war held a neutral position as regards the contestants; has exercised great patience and wisdom in the conduct of the numerous and serious situations that have naturally arisen to keep us from becoming involved in this war; and Whereas late developments have caused him to sever diplomatic relations with one of the contestants, thus bringing us to the point where it seems very questionable if war on our part can be averted if we sustain our rights and liberties as one of the first nations of the world: Therefore be it *Resolved by this Manufacturers' Club of Sandusky County, Ohio, That we offer to the President of our United States of America, in case he finds it necessary to declare war on any country to protect our rights and interests, our united and individual support to any plans that he in his wisdom may deem best to pursue.

That we hereby offer to him the use of our factories for our country's welfare, even, if necessary, to the sacrifice of our personal business.

That we hereby pledge him our faith, loyalty, and support to the ness.

That we hereby pledge him our faith, loyalty, and support to the limit of our ability to render same.

That a copy of these resolutions be sent to President Wilson, Senator HARDING, Senator POMERENE, and Representative OVERMYER.

Carried unanimously.

FREMONT, OHIO, February 13, 1917.

Regular meeting of the Manufacturers' Club of Sandusky County. B. H. SWIFT, President. HARRY ZIMMERMAN, Secretary.

Mr. DILL Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERMYER. I will.

Mr. DILL. Does the gentleman understand this resolution of these manufacturers to be that they will give their plants for use in time of war without profit, the same as Mr. Ford offers?

Mr. OVERMYER. They offer them as they indicate in their resolution, even at a sacrifice of their personal business.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the resolution says that. It says when the President declares war.

Mr. OVERMYER. That is a slip of expression.

Mr. MANN. It is a safe promise. Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the gentleman does not impugn the motives which influenced this club to make this offer.

Mr. MANN. I do not impugn their motives, but I think they have gotten hysterical, if the gentleman wants to know.

Mr. OVERMYER. I consider it a very generous and patriotic offer on their part.

Mr. MANN. It will never be fulfilled.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for pay of property and disbursing officers of the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, $50,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and beg pardon of the committee for consuming any time at all. I will not consume much, but I desire to secure some informa-tion. The reorganization of the Army bill of 1916 provides:

Hereafter not to exceed 200 clerks, Quartermaster Corps, shall be known as field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, and shall receive the same

Mr. DENT. What section? Mr. COX. I do not know, but I am reading from a letter given to me-except retirement, as heretofore allowed by law to pay clerks, Quartermaster Corps, and shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War—

Now, there is a quartermaster depot in my district in which they have four clerks designated as pay clerks and coming under this provision of the law.

The writer informs me that the Judge Advocate of the War Department construed the Army reorganization act as going into effect on the 29th day of August, 1916. Later on the Comptroller of the Treasury held that it did not go into effect until January 26, 1917. Between the date that the Judge Advocate General construed the law to go into effect and the date the comptroller held it did go into effect a lot of these clerks, however, designated under law, were made this allowance. Now they are called on to pay back about $125 each which they drew between the date when the Judge Advocate General of the Army construed the law should go into effect and the date the comptroller says it went into effect. I will ask the chairman what there is in that, if he knows?

Mr. DENT. I really did not know anything about it. The gentleman has called my attention to it for the first time.

Mr. COX. I will just read a little further from the writer of this letter, where he says:

The Quartermaster General requested and received a decision from the Judge Advocate General of the Army, dated November 7, 1916, to the effect that this provision of law took effect August 29, 1916, the date the Army appropriation bill was approved; hence the 200 clerks appointed in the latter part of December under said decision were paid for quarters, heat, and light from August 29, 1916. On February 6, 1917, the Quartermaster General sent out a letter to disbursing officers stating that the Comptroller of the Treasury had decided on January 26, 1917, that this law became effective from the date of acceptance of appointment, and that the amount paid between the date of approval and acceptance would have to be refunded.

Now, the writer of the letter says there are four clerks down there who will be called upon to pay back $125 of the allowance that has been paid to them under the act of August,

Mr. DENT. That is in the appropriation bill of August 29, 1916.

Mr. COX. This letter just came to me yesterday.
Mr. DENT. It has not been called to the attention of the committee and there is nothing in the bill to correct it.
Mr. COX. I wanted some information if the gentleman could give it, because as it is I do not know how to answer it.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit—

Mr. COX. I will; I desire information.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Army field clerks were granted this allowance heretofore denied to them because of the fact they were ordered into the field service with allowance for quarters, heat, light, and so forth, granted under this appropriation, which was an additional consideration for those men. Now, as I understand the gentleman's letter, the Judge Advocate General has rendered an opinion that these men are only entitled to allowance after the date of acceptance of employment. They had evidently been appointed quartermaster clerks prior and now became Army field clerks, and therefore were not entitled to this pay and allowances.

Mr. COX. If it is true, as the writer of this letter says, they have ordered these clerks to pay back the amount they drew out, the Judge Advocate General having decided that the law went into effect from the date the comptroller said it went into effect, it amounts, as the writer says to me, to about $125 to

Now, I do not know what can be done.

Mr. DENT. I may state to the gentleman from Indiana that this provision in the appropriation act of August 29 of last year gave these clerks an additional advantage, and I do not see any reason why they should complain if the authorities rule they did not get in a little earlier than they might have done. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. COX. I do not know whether the gentleman from Alabama catches my point or not. This allowance was made to them. It has been paid to them. Now, the Quartermaster's Department are asking the clerks that received that to refund it.

Mr. DENT. I do not see how we can take care of that. Mr. COX. Well, I do not, either.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For providing arms, ordnance stores, quartermaster stores, camp equipage, and all other military supplies for issue to the National Guard; for the promotion of rifle practice, including the acquisition, construction, maintenance, and equipment of shooting galleries and suitable target ranges; for the lire of horses and draft animals for the use of mounted troops, batteries, and wagons; for forage for the same; and for such other incidental expenses in connection with lawfully authorized encampments, manenvers, and field instruction as the Secretary of War may deem necessary; and for such other expenses pertaining to the National Guard as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law, $2,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 60, line 5, strike out the figures "$2,000,-000" and insert the figures "$4,000,000."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$4,000,000" and making it "$6,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Hull of Iowa: Page 60, line 5, strike out $2,000,000" and insert "$4,000,000."

Amendment to the amendment, by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Strike out "$4,000,000" and insert "$6,000,000."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask at this time unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded in 30 minutes, 20 minutes of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. Kahn] and 10 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of 30 minutes, 20 minutes of which time shall be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. Kahn] and 10 minutes by himself, debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall terminate. Is [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. there objection? The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to indicate how his time shall be occupied.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have made up my mind that this bill should not go through without my calling attention to the inadequacy of the estimates for arms, munitions, and military stores in this great emergency. I confess that I am astounded at the seeming paralysis, the shaking paralysis, of action in this country on this subject. want peace, other nations must know that we have made provision for war. I do not know whether this paragraph or one farther on, relating to "arms, uniforms, equipment, and so forth, for the National Guard," is the most appropriate to my amendment. It looks to me as if the semicolon on the third line of this paragraph ought to be stricken out, as if it was only arms for the promotion of rifle practice. The other paragraph is a general provision. But I shall speak on this one as if the words mean what they say as now punctuated, namely, "For providing arms, ordnance stores, quartermaster stores, camp equipage, and all other military supplies for issue to the National Guard."

This is the first paragraph we have read that has no tag to it to the effect that the arms must be made in the United States armories. It is the first that gives discretion to the administration to go and buy arms and guns and munitions if they need them. We are in a special condition now. We have In they need them. We are in a special condition now. We have in this country factories that they say are making 6,000 rifles a day, or have been doing so, and some of these factories have been told they are not needed any more abroad, and their machines will become junk. It is for the benefit of the United States that some contract, at least, should be issued to these factories so that they can be kept going and induced to keep their factories in a condition to make United States arms.

But as to amounts you have been told that the appropriate

But as to amounts, you have been told that the appropriations are not up to the estimates, which were for supplying an army of 1,500,000 men with artillery supplies in seven years, and in three years with one rifle apiece, when two rifles are needed for each man that goes into the field. We know that if military service is adopted there will be 800,000 men a year to be supplied, and in five years that will be 4,000,000. If we unfortunately should be forced into war, we will have to call out millions of men in the beginning. Where are the arms and

I urge upon this committee that they should appropriate largely under some item in this bill that will give full discretion to obtain the arms and munitions which at least will enable us to say that we can fight if we have to do so, but that we want peace and insist upon it. I beg of this committee now on this item to give the sum I have mentioned, and to make it immediately available, so that it can be used in discretion. We are going to borrow money. For what better purpose can it be borrowed than to give arms to the people so that peace shall be preserved?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said my say. I have not interrupted this bill. I do not wish to delay it. But as an American I stand aghast at the possibilities; I stand aghast at the fact that we are not asked for these appropriations, but I stand still more aghast at the thought of what will happen to this country unless we make blanket appropriations for arms and munitions which will protect the country in time of need.

[Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to bear out in some regard the statements made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] with reference to the small-arms factories in this I believe that something should be done, and done at once, to keep in operation those factories that are now going out of business by reason of the contracts with foreign countries having nearly expired. In my own district—and this embar-rasses me somewhat, inasmuch as it may seem that I am interested in some way other than in a Federal way-in my district, in the village of Ilion, we have what is known as the Remington arms plant, and they have a capacity of about 3,000 Lee-Enfield rifles a day. A year ago, before I came down here, I was just as enthusiastic for preparedness as I am to-day, and in order to be advised on the question as to how long it would take to turn over that factory from the Lee-Enfield rifle to the Springfield rifle, such as we use in our Army, I made a tour of that plant and a careful study of the situation, and was advised by its manager, Mr. Houghton, that upon call from this Government they could turn that plant from the Lee-Enfield to the Springfield in 60 days. I heard some gentleman say on the floor that it would take 18 months.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SNYDER. I am giving this information just as it came to me. I would be pleased to yield.

Mr. TILSON. Perhaps I was the gentleman to whom he referred. I was quoting from the board of Army officers which visited a number of arms-producing plants in this country and talked with the managers of those concerns, as stated in their That report was to the effect that it would require at least 18 months to convert those factories from the production of foreign arms to the manufacture of ours.

Mr. SNYDER. I am quoting the statements of the manager of a plant whom I know. I have confidence in his judgment. I do not think it would take much longer than he suggests. I have some information here that will give some idea as to when we may expect deliveries on a Vickers gun contract which, I understand, was placed last November. I have a letter here from the assistant general manager of the Marlin Arms Co. to a friend of mine, Col. John J. Dooley, of the Savage Arms Co., under date of December 20, 1916, in which he says under date of December 20, 1916, in which he says:

MY DEAR COL. DOOLEY: I see by the papers that our friends the Colt people have gotten the Vickers contract through having the order placed with the Vickers Co. of London and they in turn subletting it to the Colt people.

I do not know that you are aware that they received a contract in September, 1915, for 16,000 Vickers guns. They were to commence deliveries last March, but failed in getting under way to such an extent that the English canceled 6,000 of the guns and turned over to the Russians the balance of 10,000. Up to date they have not shipped any guns, but succeeded in getting 5 made during the month of November. What chance has the United States Government of getting these 4,000 guns delivered when they owe the Russian Government over 9,500?

I thought this bit of detail would be interesting to you, and give it to you as being very accurate.

* * *

Wery truly, yours,

MARLIN ARMS CORPORATION,

MARLIN ARMS CORPORATION, J. E. OWSLEY, Assistant General Manager.

Now, that is a question that I thought well to bring up at this I would like to have some knowledge on it, and I think other Members of this House would like to have some information as to when there is a possibility of deliveries. great need for these guns, possibly coming sooner than any of us expect, and I would like to know, and my constituents would like to know, what the possibilities are of a delivery of a reasonable number of guns on that contract.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These contracts are on British and Russian account with United States factories?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of any provision of law now under which we can take over those contracts on the part of the United States?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we had war with any foreign power, could these contracts now existing between the American factories and foreign agents be taken for American

Mr. SNYDER. I believe they ought to be; but even after that I am still concerned as to how long it would take for them to deliver a reasonable quantity of guns. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Green].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if we are to have a National Guard at all, we ought to have an efficient one. If we are not going to supply the National Guard with the means to make it efficient, we ought to abolish it and take up some other system.

The paragraph under consideration in this case provides an appropriation, among other things, for targets, target practice, and the means to properly equip them. I regard it as of the very highest importance that our National Guard should be properly trained in rifle shooting. I showed, in speaking at one time before this House, that the rifle teams of the guard had always beaten the rifle teams of the Regulars and the Marinesthem at long distance, beaten them at short distance, and beaten them at rapid fire; but when they were assembled last fall, by reason of the large increase of the increments of the organization, inevitably a number of new men were taken in who were not skilled in rifle practice.

When our three Iowa regiments assembled near Des Moines for preliminary training and being mustered in, they were supplied with 52 targets. They were directed, however, by the Regular officers in charge of the particular matter not to use more than 100 rounds per man in rifle shooting. Of course, this was absolutely insufficient to develop any marksmen. The State had to supply the means for further training, and there was practice to a considerable extent training in rifle shooting before they started for Brownsville. When they got to Brownsville they found there were only 14 targets for 10,000 men, and the result was that the Laws recipiests and the result was that the Iowa regiments-and I am inclined to think it was the same thing with other regiments—practically received no training in rifle shooting during the entire six months they were down on the border.

Now, my colleague from Iowa [Mr. Hull] has moved to raise this item from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000. I do not know anything as to what the proper amount should be, but I do know that it ought to be enough, so that there should be something that could be called training in rifle shooting. I believe they should not be restricted to 100 rounds per man in training in the use of the rifle, because that would not give any man the proper skill. Of course, it has been said in reference to the European warfare that the machine gun is going to be the most important factor in future wars. But, notwithstanding that may be so, the rifle is still the weapon of the ordinary soldier, and we have no great number of machine guns.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that if we are going to have a National Guard at all, if we are going to continue to use this system, the men ought to be provided with sufficient material to make themselves efficient in the ordinary arm of the private

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] will use some of his time.

Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from

New York for five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will not take all the time allotted to me. All I want to say is that if we are going to depend on the National Guard they must be properly trained. You can not train them unless you spend the money necessary to do it. In these appropriations here we have not provided enough money to buy the actual cartridges that will be shot, much less provided for the transportation and the feed of the horses and other incidental expenses necessary in such training.

Now, it is of no use for us to make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of this country. If we are going to have any kind of pre-paredness, let us go down into our pockets and pay for it. It is of no use for us to say, "Oh, well, the Senate will add some-thing to the bill." The responsibility is ours, and we have no right to say that somebody else on the other side of this Capitol is going to take care of the things that are neglected by this House and this committee. I say with earnestness-I do not want to lose my temper over the thing-that it is near to foolishness for us to attempt to place the reliance of this country upon the National Guard and then not properly take care of it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. In a moment. A few minutes ago it was pointed out here that it had been the policy of the Military Committee to provide for the encampments of the National Guard once in two years, and that the National Guard had had an encampment on the Mexican border in 1916. But this is the appropriation bill for 1918, two years from the time these men got their training, and we are now asking for an appropriation to train these men in 1918, who will not be the same men that went to the border in 1916. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is the gentleman familiar with the law by which it is required that two militia officers shall be stationed at the War Department here in Washington?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; the law is there, but I do not think the officers have been stationed there.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Can the gentleman, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee, advise me why this provision in the law has been overlooked or disregarded by the War Department?

Mr. CALDWELL, I can not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I merely want to correct the gentleman in the detail that this appropriation will provide for maneuvers to be held this coming summer. The fiscal year begins July 1, 1917, and there will be no other maneuvers except those held during the coming summer, before the expiration of the fiscal year June 30, 1918.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the maneuvers are held after the 1st of July, but not if they are held before July.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman will consult his own memory and experience, which will tell him that they do not hold these maneuvers in the winter or spring.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is in error in supposing that we appropriate for maneuvers only once every two years. propriate for maneuvers every year—one year for the mobile troops of the National Guard and the other year for the Coast Artillery

Mr. DENT. I stated that very distinctly a few minutes ago, I

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman stated that we appropriated for these maneuvers only once in two years.

Mr. CALDWELL. And now, after the corrections that the gentleman has been kind enough to call to my attention, I say that we have a new scheme as compared with the scheme under which we have been working in past years. We have a scheme by which we have federalized the National Guard and by which we propose really to prepare this country. It was felt that in the past we have not been prepared, and we can not be prepared unless these men are properly trained. I think at least $4,000,000 ought to be appropriated under this item.

Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the last day or so I have taken up the time of the committee a little. I have thought it was my duty to do so. I have not done it in order to embarrass the committee or to delay the action of this House.

I think that all experts agree that the ordnance department, as provided for in the national-defense act, is one of the best pieces of legislation contained in that act. I will admit that when this bill was under consideration I coincided practically with the committee, voting for all the increases that were asked; but when the Secretary of War wrote us a letter and called our attention to the fact that we had not properly provided for the Army, I thought it was the duty of some member of this committee to call the attention of the country to it, and the only way in which attention could be called was in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and there let you thrash out for yourselves the question whether the Secretary of War, the General Staff, the War Department, were right in asking for these increases,

These amendments have caused some discussion in regard to some matters, and I want to talk briefly about some things that have observed in relation to preparedness

I want to take up the question of rifles, and before I go any further I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] to the fact that if he has in his district anyone who can manufacture Springfield rifles and deliver them within 60 days, if they will do it at a reasonable price, he ought to get in touch with the Chief of Ordnance. They have been looking a long time for some one who would manufacture the Springfield rifles.

Mr. SNYDER. I did not say they could deliver in 60 days. I said the plant could be changed in 60 days from Lee-Enfield to Springfield.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They will not ask you to deliver in 60 days. They will ask you for a contract, and I would like to know the price they will put upon these rifles.

I have watched with interest our frantic endeavors of the last two weeks to put ourselves in a state of preparedness for any emergency that might arrive, and as the invoice of our military condition has gradually appeared to the public I could not help but apply to the condition that old adage that we, the American people, are prone "to lock the stable door after the horse has been stolen." It is a lamentable fact that the life horse has not prepared in a military way as it should be, to meet the grave emergencies which are now before us. When I speak of being prepared, I do not mean our lack of men and officers. There is a popular conception that preparedness means a large body of trained soldiers and commissioned men. These are essential, but not the most essential. The first principle of preparedness, as I view it, is to secure the necessary arms, ammunition, and other equipment necessary to equip the soldier. Then make the right provisions and we can obtain the culistment.

I have been very much interested in the work of the Ordnance Department during the two years I have served in Congress. My position on the Military Affairs Committee has brought me in very close touch with this portion of our military work, and I am glad to have had even a small part in the reorganization which is gradually taking place.

In connection with this, I want to call your attention to just one item that comes under the direct jurisdiction of this department, and in my estimation is one of the most important items with which we should be prepared; that is, army rifles. Experience has shown that the army rifle is the most essential war instrument. Without rifles an army is helpless, and the nation is helpless. Let us go back about two years. In March, 1915, the European conflict had been going on for almost a At that time the crisis in Europe should have warned us that the United States was unprepared and that there was an imminent danger that it might become involved in the conflict at any time. Despite this specter of war, the Army appropriation bill for that year provided just $250,000 for the manufacture of rifles. This sum of money was sufficient to manufacture only 15,000 of the Springfield guns, a number so small that it would hardly equip the National Guard in one of our big States, and would provide for an army so infinitesimal that it could hardly be considered. At the very time this appropriation was made the Springfield Arsenal was capable of manufacturing 150,000 per year and the Rock Island Arsenal of manufacturing 75,000 per year. With all of this Government equipment waiting to be used the authorized department could not proceed to manufacture the thing most necessary for military preparedness, because Congress refused to give it the funds to do so. A year ago I had the pleasure of voting with the committee to provide $5,000,000 for the manufacture of small arms, a sum which at that time I thought inadequate, and the bill this year, I am glad to say, carries an appropriation of $7,500,000. I want to call your attention to this fact, however, that it takes weeks or months to get a rifle factory running in good order, and although the plant that was so long idle at the Rock Island Arsenal has again resumed operation, I understand that the first finished rifle has not yet been produced. I simply call attention to this fact to emphasize that it takes months to turn out the finished product, after the appropriation has been made, and we may need these rifles long before we can produce them.

I believe that the Ordnance Department has been provided for in the national-defense act better than ever before, and when these matters were brought to the committee many of the increases that were asked for were granted. When, however, the Secretary of War sent to that committee a letter calling attention to the fact that it had not properly provided for the Army, I took it to be the duty of some member of the com-mittee to call the attention of the whole country to this condition, to bring it before the Committee of the Whole House, and there let this legislative body become cognizant of the present condition. I want to call your attention to one paragraph in this letter; it is as follows:

An examination of the above table will show that if the amount of the original estimates are not restored, the military resources of the country, in so far as munitions, stores, and supplies are concerned, will not be satisfactorily developed during 1918 on account of lack of

You will notice from this that if we do not vote the sums asked by the Ordnance Department we are striking a blow at the very vitals of military preparedness. What will we gain by enlisting a large body of men; what will we gain by federalizing the National Guard; what will we gain by increasing the enlisted men in the Navy if we have not the necessary arms, ammunition, and other military equipment with which to provide them? It seems to me it is a serious question and one which deserves your very earnest consideration.

Mr. DENT. I stated at the outset of my remarks that attention has been called to the fact that this paragraph, providing arms, ordnance stores, and so forth, on page 59, might possibly conflict with the paragraph on page 62 providing for arms, uniforms, and so forth. I inquired of the Militia Bureau why those two items were carried as separate para-The reason for it is that the law has gradually Under section 67 of the national-defense act there is a provision for this particular paragraph that we are now considering—that was the earlier law on this subject, adopted by Congress a number of years ago. Subsequently Congress adopted another law for the procuring of various kinds of equipment necessary for the National Guard, which is taken care of in section 83 of the national-defense act.

I think myself that hereafter these two items ought to be combined and carried as one, but this has been the habit of the committee for years.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the chairman wish the committee to understand that this section does not provide for the procuring of arms for the National Guard, but that that is taken care of in another section?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. What particular branch of the service is covered by this item more than any other thing?

Mr. DENT. It is defined in section 67 of the nationaldefense act, where it says that a sum of money shall hereafter be appropriated to pay for the support of the National Guard, including the expense of providing arms-and I suppose that is the small arms, as the other provides for artillery and heavy arms-ordnance stores, quartermaster supplies, camp equipage, and other military supplies to be used by the National Guard. That was intended principally, as I understand, for the purpose of all of the maneuvers of the National Guard.

Mr. McKENZIE. One of the principal items asked for under this section is for appropriation of money to buy additional rifle ranges.

Mr. DENT.

Mr. McKENZIE. How many rifle ranges have we now? Mr. DENT. One hundred and thirty-six. I was coming to that proposition. Last year the committee gave $1,000,000 under this paragraph. The department came before the committee and asked that that be increased to $4,000,000. The committee gave them $2,000,000. It was distinctly asked the Militia Bureau, What will be done with the additional increase of $3,000,000 which you are asking for above the appropriation of last year? And the answer was that we propose to use $1,000,000 to purchase new target ranges, when they already had, as brought out by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. An-THONY], 136 ranges.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is there anything in the hearings that discloses where they expect to spend the $1,000,000?

Mr. DENT. Absolutely nothing; and the committee rejected that request. Then I asked this question: You have under-taken to explain what you expect to do with one increase of $1,000,000 and that is to provide new target ranges. What are you going to do with the other $1,000,000? He said that is for incidental expenses, and to this good day there is nothing in the hearings to show what the incidental expenses are to be composed of.

Now, is the Military Committee of the House and the Congress of the United States to give to the War Department $1,000,000 for incidental expenses without any explanation as to how the money shall be expended?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman remember the consideration that was urged before him of the need of a target range, at least 4 miles long, near the city of New York, and the acquisition of such a range?

Mr. DENT. I remember, of course, that the gentleman called upon me and presented that proposition, and it struck me as being a fair proposition, but that is new legislation. I understood the gentleman from New Jersey to say that there was only one chance of getting it in, and that was by putting it in in the Senate, because the bill had already been submitted

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment. The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That when any land which has been heretofore or may be hereafter acquired by purchase for a target range for the use of the National Guard of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall have become useless or shall be found to be unavailable for such purpose, the Secretary of War may cause the same to be sold either in whole or in two or more parts as he may deem best for the interests of the United States. In the disposal of such property the Secretary of War shall cause the same to be appraised either as a whole or in two or more tracts, having due reference to the requirements of any permanent improvements made thereon; and he shall therefore cause the property to be offered at public or private sale at not less than the appraised value. The expenses for advertising, appraisement, survey, and sale shall be paid from the proceeds of the sale; and the net proceeds thereof shall be placed to the credit of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, as additional to its allotment under section 67 of the act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. STAFEORD. Mr. Chairman, Lreserve, a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order

Mr. KAHN. I desire to offer an amendment to the section. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think some explanation should be given as to the need of vesting this authority in the Secretary of War to sell target ranges which he deems no longer needed for the service.

Mr. DENT. The explanation is simply this: There are a number of these ranges that were purchased many years ago. At the time they were purchased they were some distance from the cities that had a very much smaller population than they now have; for instance, in the city of Detroit, which is one of the cities. The result is that the city has grown up to the range and around the range, so that it can not be utilized without destroying life or property. They are really very much more valuable than when they were purchased, and the Government will gain by selling the property.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many such instances are there?

Mr. DENT. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. For the information of the gentleman I will say that there are three-one in South Dakota, one at Detroit, Mich., and one at Jackson, Mich.

Mr. GORDON. Every year we have to pay claims for windows destroyed and other damage done. We make an appropriation right in this bill to pay damage claims of that kind. That suggests one reason why they ought to be disposed of.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the explanation of the gentleman from Ohio, added to that of the chairman of the committee, is so all-sufficing that I am compelled to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 17, after the word "shall," strike out the word "therefore."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the word "therefore" makes no sense, and it ought to go out.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last I have an editorial from yesterday's Lousiville Courier-Journal on the subject of the war referendum which I desire to send to the desk and have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WAR REFERENDUM.

Mr. C. P. Simonton, the county court clerk of Tipton County, Tenn., sends to the Courier-Journal a copy of a resolution which he says he has prepared as a substitute for the resolution introduced in Congress by Mr. Callaway, of Texas, providing that any declaration of war by the United States shall be referred to a vote of the people.

One clause of Mr. Simonton's substitute, covering a matter which Mr. Callaway seems to have overlooked, provides:

"Every duly qualified voter shall, in the presence of the election officers, and prior to casting his or her ballot in said election, pledge himself or herself to volunteer as a private in the United States Army or in the naval forces of said United States, and shall thereupon, prior to casting said ballot, sign and execute and acknowledge in the presence of said election officers enlistment papers in said Army or Navy, conditioned that in the event of a declaration of war, in accordance with the expressed will at the polls of a majority of those legally voting in said election, such enlistment in said Army or Navy shall be binding and of full force and effect; otherwise to be null and void."

shall be binding and of full force and effect; otherwise to be null and void."

But by far the most important feature of Mr. Simonton's substitute—a feature, incredible as it may seem, not even touched upon by Mr. Callaway—is thus worded:

"Provided further, That in the event of delay in the official canvass of the official vote of California, Minnesota, New Hampshire, or any other State, the official vote of which would change the result of said election, or if the validity of a sufficient number of votes cast in said election, or if the validity of a sufficient number of votes cast in said election be contested or called in question, that the President of said United States be, and he is hereby, directed to earnestly request said nation, through the ruler thereof, through regular diplomatic channels (or to post in the United States mall a communication to that effect, with special-delivery stamp affixed thereon), that said nation or ruler thereof refrain and desist from mobilizing its troops, seizing strategic points, or taking any military or naval steps to the prejudice of the United States Government during the pendency of such contest or until the official canvass of said votes is completed, the validity of said votes in contest to be finally determined within not exceeding three years of said election by the court of last resort.

"If such request be denied or ignored, said President of the United States shall immediately rent an official residence in Buck Snort, Nebr., or in Rough Edge, Kans., and notify his wife to instruct the servants to immediately begin packing the household and kitchen furniture in the White House, and he and his family, together with said furniture, shall be transported to said official residence in Buck Snort, Nebr., or Rough Edge, Kans., to the end that said President shall not be present in the White House in Washington to formally greet and welcome the victorious troops of said foreign nation when they occupy same, and that no provision whatever be made for their bodily comfo

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Travel of inspector-instructors and sergeant-instructor, in making visits of instruction and inspection to armoriess, $130,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the superfluous "s" in the word "armoriess" may be stricken

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. While we are on these National Guard items I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee to a matter that was brought to my attention this morning. In the national-defense act provision was made in section 63 for service by any corps of Artillery, Cavalry, or In-fantry existing in any of the States on the passage of the act of March 8, 1792. These organizations, which must necessarily be of very rare old age, were allowed to retain certain of their "ancient privileges," subject, nevertheless, to all duties required by law of militia, including the office of "cornet," which was once held by a former Speaker of this House, the Hon. was once held by a former Speaker of this House, the Hon. Samuel J. Randall, while a member of the famous City Troop of Philadelphia, which escorted George Washington in his day, and which has escorted every other President of the United States who ever came officially to our city. The national-defense act made special provision, I say, that these ancient privileges of these ancient companies might be preserved. It happened that the "cornet" of the City Troop when it went into the service June 22, 1916, was John Conyngham Stevens, who served from June 22, 1916, to January 22, 1917, a period of about seven months. As it stands now, this "cornet," John Conyngham Stevens, is left between heaven and earth, because, having served as required by the national-defense act, he is held up on pay account under rulings of the department because it is discovered there is no authority to pay.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. Mr. DENT. As I understand the law of the national-defense act, it is provided in section 61 that no State shall maintain any other troops in time of peace except those provided for in this act, and section 63 was intended to make an exception to section 61 of the act so as to authorize these ancient organizations to which the gentleman refers to maintain their organizations without violating the national-defense act; but where do they come in for pay?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They were accepted by the Federal Government. This man was accepted and served.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.
Mr. KAHN. Their organizations were to continue only in time of peace, and when they were called into the national service the services of the cornet were dispensed with and he received a commission similar to the one held by other officers of the National Guard doing that class of work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Which I understand was equivalent to that of second lieutenant. I want to read this much of the communication handed to me this morning with reference to this particular and peculiar office:

Our cornet, John Conyngham Stevens, served throughout the tour of duty from June 22, 1916, until we were mustered out on January 22, but never received any pay from the Federal Government during that time, as the paymasters refused to pay him for the reason that they did not have on their pay rolls any rate of pay for the office of cornet, or any official authority under their instructions to pay him. All of this was quite natural, for if they had made a mistake in the absence of any authority they would have been held accountable for that amount.

The City Troop approaches this matter in the proper spirit. It did faithful and efficient service, and in accordance with the national-defense act it used its officer, the cornet, according to the privileges granted to it in the act.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that it did not, however good their faith might have been and doubtless was, because the provision in this same section 63 reads:

Provided, That said organizations may be a part of the National Guard and entitled to all of the privileges of this act, and shall conform in all respects to the organization, discipline, and training of the National Guard in time of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has this cornet received any compensation whatever for his services?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. None whatever. Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He can not as cornet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the matter was first brought to my attention this morning. I would like to return to page 11, line 9, for the purpose of offering this amend-Provided further, That Cornet John Conyngham Stevens, First Troop, Philadelphia City Cavalry, shall receive pay at the rate allowed a second lieutenant, for service to the Federal Government from June 22, 1916, to January 22, 1917, inclusive.

That is a period of seven months for which this cornet gave up his time and services to the Government of the United States. am quite sure it is not the intention of the department or of Congress to deprive him of compensation for his services.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, section 63 provides that in case of war all of these offices that are surplus offices absolutely It was not the intention of the committee, and I do not believe it was the intention of the House at the time the law was passed, to provide for any of these ancient offices. It was only intended to permit them to continue in time of peace and when they were not in the service of the United

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are we to understand that the thought of the committee is that a man is to be drafted into the services of the United States and is to serve for seven

Mr. DENT. Well, he could not be drafted into the service.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He certainly was accepted in

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the committee accept the

I hope the gentleman will not offer the amend-Mr. DENT. ment here. So far as this particular case is concerned, the individual case appeals to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume this is the only case of its kind in the United States.

Mr. DENT. I would not like to open the bill to a proposition of this kind, and I hope the gentleman will not insist on

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would require unanimous consent to go back to page 11.

Mr. DENT. I really would not like to go back now, and I hope the gentleman will not ask it. Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman in his time what remedy he would suggest for this officer who went into the service in good faith, and who served faithfully under the law?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will permit, has the War Department recommended anything in regard to it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Inquiry has been made at the War Department, I understand, but word comes from El Paso, Tex., where the application for pay has been pending, that nothing has been heard from the Quartermaster General on the subject.

Mr. KAHN. Until the War Department makes some recommendation I do not think the committee ought to go into the matter.

I do not think myself we ought to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee declines to go back at this time?

Mr. DENT. At this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to get the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment. In the Army appropriation bill hearings, page 1127, I find an interrogatory propounded by the chairman to one of the officers relating to the assignment of officers of the National Guard. Will the chairman inform me whether or not these militia officers have been assigned to duty in the War Department?
Mr. DENT. To the Militia Bureau?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.
Mr. DENT. They have not.
Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the chairman tell me when he expects they will be assigned there?

Mr. DENT. The chairman has no expectation on the subject whatever himself. The appropriation bill for 1917, carrying out the act of June 3, 1916, provided for two officers of the National Guard to be assigned to the Militia Bureau.

Mr. RAGSDALE. With the ranks of colonel and lieutenant colonel?

Mr. DENT. Yes. And we made an appropriation in order to take care of them. The War Department told the committee that there had been no assignment of officers of the National Guard because they were on duty on the Mexican border. The reason they assigned was that all the National Guard had been carried to the border. I will state to the gentleman that the committee, and I think I can state it fairly and frankly, were unanimously of the opinion that that was not a good excuse or good reason, and the committee therefore in this bill reappropriated the $12,000 for that purpose to see if the War Department would carry out the intention of Congress.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Would the chairman kindly state to me further whether or not he thinks they will be assigned there?

Mr. DENT. Well, I can not express an opinion of that kind. I do not know whether they will or not. I will say to the gentleman that so far as the committee is concerned and so far as the present chairman is concerned he shall urge that the law be carried out in accordance with the intention of Con-

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the chairman inform me further whether he thinks there is any legitimate excuse at this time that justifies their not being on duty there at this time?

Mr. DENT. I may state frankly I do not think the excuse given is a good one.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman give me in his time what he thinks the object is in not appointing these officers for duty there?

Mr. DENT. Well, I would not like to go into a statement on that subject at this time. It is very important we get for the National Guard. The committee's attention was called through with this bill, and that would require a rather lengthy discussion

Mr. RAGSDALE. I suppose the gentleman might put his answer, that for the good of the service, on the advice of counsel, he declines to answer. I withdraw the pro forma amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Arms, uniforms, equipment, etc., National Guard: To procure by purchase or manufacture and issue from time to time to the National Guard upon requisition of the governors of the several States and Territories, or the commanding general, National Guard of the District of Columbia, such number of United States service arms, with all accessories, Field Artillery and Coast Artillery material, engineer, signal, and sanitary material, accouterments, field uniforms, clothing, equipage, publications, and military stores of all kinds, including public animals, as are necessary to arm, uniform, and equip for field service the National Guard in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated $76,000, or so much thereof as may be required, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be made available for the purchase and maintenance of material and equipment necessary for the proper instruction in military aviation of such officers and enlisted men of the National Guard as may be authorized by the War Department to attend the United States aviation school, $4,000,000.

Mr. DENT Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 62, line 22, after the word "animals," insert the following: "And a reserve supply of such arms, material, accounterments, field uniforms, clothing, equipage, and military stores of all kinds."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 63, line 7, by striking out "$4,000,000" and inserting "$7,000,000"; also strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the sum of $3,000,000 out of this appropriation shall be used solely for the purpose of securing the reserve supply herein provided for."

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman will yield, I have an amendment I wanted to insert in this paragraph which will not increase the sum total as amended by him. It is an application of a part of the total we appropriate. Now, if the chairman will allow me to offer this amendment and have it pending, I would like to discuss my amendment, unless the gentleman wants to discuss the other one.

Mr. DENT. I am perfectly willing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman desires his amendment reported for information. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Craco: Page 62, line 25, after the last line on the bottom of page 62, add the following words: "appropriated $924,000 shall be used for the purchase, manufacture, care, maintenance, operation, and repair of airships and other aerial machines, motor-propelled vehicles, buildings for equipment and personnel, and other accessories necessary in the aero units of the National Guard: Provided further, That of the sum herein."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. This amendment was not read except for information, was it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, there was no occasion for the reservation of the point of order, and I withdraw it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman offering all the amendments now, but I would ask that the debate on this paragraph be limited if there is going to be any discussion on my amendment. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania suspend until we can dispose of the committee amend-

Now, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I have offered this amendment increasing this appropriation from $4,000,000 to $7,000,000 for the purpose of taking care of a reserve supply, as indicated in the amendment, for the National Guard. I may state to the committee that when the Militia Bureau first came before our committee they asked for an appropriation of $3,900,000. That was the original request of the bureau. The committee granted $4,000,000. Subsequently Gen. Sharpe, the Chief of the Quartermaster's Bureau, came before the committee with a supplemental estimate, asking for $11,700,000 as a reserve stock, and stated to the committee that the reserve supply of the National Guard was practically gone, and that in the event the National Guard was subsequently called out, as it was last year, there would be no reserve stock on hand. The committee did not think, in view of the past experience that the National Guard had had with this reserve supply, that this entire amount should be granted, but the committee did think that something ought to be done at this time, and that at least a start should be made to replenish the stock of reserve supply that ought to be on hand to the fact that at the depot of the Quartermaster's Department in Philadelphia, when the Pennsylvania and the New Jersey troops were called into the service, their reserve supply was absolutely exhausted, and that it had been utilized at the Plattsburg camp. Therefore the committee thought that we ought to go slow on this proposition, but we were willing to at least provide something like one-fourth of the request of the Militia Bureau for the reserve supply in the appropriation bill this year, with the proviso that I have indicated, that it must be used exclusively for this purpose.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. KAHN.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman.
Mr. KAHN. The committee also held that the National Guard, having very recently been on the border, were fully equipped at the present time.

Mr. DENT. That is true, and I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Yes. Mr. DENT.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman, touching the National Guard on the border being fully equipped, that there is now pending before the Committee on Appropriations a very considerable estimate for appropriations for equipment of the National Guard, in connection with the deficiency bill, with the statement that the equipment is very largely worn out and useless

Mr. DENT. I will ask the gentleman is not that deficiency called for on account of the fact that the guard has been supplied but they did not have the money to pay for it?

Mr. CANNON. It was not upon that ground. What the action of the committee may be later on I do not know, and I will not say, but I am telling the gentleman what the hearing

Mr. KAHN. Was it not because the department did not have enough supplies and had to go out in the market and purchase them and obligate themselves?

Mr. CANNON. I was called out before it was finished, but it was put upon the ground that these men must be fully equipped, owing to the service on the border, and, as I gathered it, and I think I am fairly accurate, that the equipment of the National Guard, of the 120,000, I think, that was on the bor-

National Guard, of the 120,000, I think, that was on the bolder, was substantially useless.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Craco] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will again report. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 62, line 25, after the last line on the bottom of page 62, add the following words: "appropriated, $924,000 shall be used for the purchase, manufacture, care, maintenance, operation, and repair of airships and other aerial machines, motor-propelled vehicles, buildings for equipment and personnel, and other accessories necessary in the aero units of the National Guard: Provided further, That of the sum herein."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that the figures given here, added to the $76,000 appropriated in the paragraph, makes $1,000,000 for the establishment of aero companies in the National Guard of the United States. The only item in the paragraph applying to any part of the National Guard for aviation instruction is the $76,000. That is purely a matter of instruction. Now, I am thoroughly convinced that this is a step which we should take, and take now. While I ad-mit that the aero service in our Army has been very deficient until within the last few months, since the advent of Gen. Squier in that department we are satisfied, I think, that great strides have been made and great progress has been gained. Not only is this legislation necessary in order to accomplish anything here, but we must authorize the amount of money to be expended.

Aviation companies already organized in the National Guardand this may be new to some people that we have such com-panies—are kept up mainly by the Civilian Aero Club of the United States, and have made wonderful progress. They are They are trying to produce men and officers who are capable of handling this branch of the service. I read from a letter which I have recently received:

The aviation companies already organized in the National Guard have had a most trying experience during the past six months with the Army aviation people, who apparently are trying to get the officers and men of these companies to give up the fight to attain efficiency and to secure their discharges for the purpose of joining a Federal Reserve. The argument used is that nothing can be accomplished under the "National Guard conditions." Further, it is claimed that a very costly equipment is necessary for an aviation company and that this can not be made available for a National Guard unit, the inference being that whatever is required will be made available if the personnel will go into the Federal Reserve. Experience in the National Guard indicates that the more technical and difficult the character of the work the greater is the relative efficiency of the National Guard unit on account of the technical personnel that can be secured. This is borne out by the record made by the National Guard signal companies on the border. I believe there is little doubt that we can develop very efficient aviation units if those charged with the Federal supervision are sincerely interested in aiding the work. The National Guard organizations will furnish the proper personnel and adequate facilities. It is expected that the Federal Government will furnish the materiel and equipment. Trained aviators already exist in the units already organized. Were we confronted with a real war the number of aviators and aviation units required would be so great that the nucleus of the Regular Army aviation personnel would be almost negligible. It would seem to be the part of wisdom to develop a substantial number of aviation units in the National Guard. The qualifications prescribed by the War Department for recognition of an aviation unit are almost prohibitive. The idea does not seem to be to obtain an untrained personnel possessing the fundamental qualities necessary to obtain efficiency and then by training to develop the unit, but rather to insist that the personnel shall be trained at the time the unit is presented for acceptance.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. Mr. KAHN. How many units are really organized?

Mr. CRAGO. Two in New York are all that I have particular information about. But the fact that I wanted to make plain is this, that the more technical the skill which is required in these different units the easier it is to get the right caliber of men to fill these units in the National Guard. The experience is that this is a branch of the service which we have neglected too long. The experience in Europe has demonstrated the fact that in order to do anything with the armies you must control the In order to move your army you must be in possession of air. the air—the upper berth, the upper deck, so to speak—because the man up there controls the army on the ground and underground, and every movement forward or backward on the part of the army is regulated by these men signaling in the air.

We must not put this off too long. We must place it in the hands of these bright young men of our country who are anxious to qualify themselves for this work. If the National Guard can furnish the men, is it not the duty of the Government to furnish the material and the instruction? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I renew it.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman know whether the War Department is favoring the organization of these National Guard units or not?

Mr. CRAGO. They have rather insisted that these men go into the reserve, and they have hesitated to put this costly material and equipment in their hands. But the experience of the signal corps organized in the National Guard should prove to them that this material will be properly cared for. It would all be under the supervision of the War Department.

Mr. REAVIS. With our Nebraska Guard we had an aero corps, with a very efficient aviator, Capt. McMillan. I went to the War Department and asked that they be mustered in, and instead of complying with my request the War Department made an effort to get this aviator out of the National Guard and get him to enlist in the Army, thus tending to destroy our corps instead of building it up.

Mr. CRAGO. That has been the experience in New York.

They say we have not the aviators necessary to put in these companies, but the answer to that is: "We have many brainy young men skilled in this line who want to go into this work, and it is up to you to instruct them."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not likely that the aviation Mr. GREENE of vermont. Is it not likely that the aviation branch of the National Guard service will attract a grade of highly expert young men who will not go into the ranks and undergo the drudgery, as they think, of drilling with the rifle and marching, but who would like to exercise their brains in the solution of these air problems?

Mr. CRAGO. That is the point I have been endeavoring to make plain to this House. When we are talking of this universal training, here is a chance to get it in an organization that already exists and it does away with the idea that milk-that already exists, and it does away with the idea that military training means simply carrying a gun. It does not mean merely that, by a great deal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that they have been using aeroplanes quite extensively in Mexico?

Mr. CRAGO. They have used them successfully in the last four or five months. After Col. Squier took charge of the corps they were able to carry the mail from Columbus to Pershing's front, 110 miles, in 66 minutes, and they have not had a single mishap since they inaugurated the service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know to what extent aeroplanes are built and used in Canada?

Mr. CRAGO. Î do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is possible for airships to come into this country from vessels lying off our coast, is it not? Mr. CRAGO. Yes. I was calling attention to the necessity of our waking up to the importance of this new means of warfare and giving our young men a chance to prepare themselves. Let us not put ourselves in the position where Kipling placed the English people when he spoke of them as-

Given to strong delusion, Wholly believing a lie, Ye saw that the land lay defenseless, And ye let the months go by.

Let us waken from our delusions of safety in mere numbers; let us train our young men so that, should the test come, they may not say of us:

You pushed them raw to the battle, As you plucked them raw from the street.

[Applause.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of all proper appropriations for the Aviation Corps. I think that corps ought to be built up and made more efficient. This year we are appropriating in this bill $9,000,000 for aviation. We have already passed the item in this bill. In the fortifica-tions bill they have an appropriation of $4,800,000 more for aviation. In the naval bill my good friend, Capt. Butler, tells me they have appropriated $5,133,000 more, making in all nearly $19,000,000 for aviation this year at this session of Congress. We appropriated in the Army bill last year $13,281,666. They have not yet spent nearly all of this stupendous sum. So that Congress has been very generous in the matter of appropriations for aviation.

I want to call your attention to the peculiar situation in which we find ourselves in reference to aviation. Now, we have organized in the Army and in our coast defenses a number of aviation squadrons. An aviation squadron is composed of 12 machines. The machines wear out every three months. that they must have 48 machines for each squadron in order to run it for a year.

Mr. KAHN. Twelve machines.

McKELLAR. Twelve machines at one time, but they need 48 for a year, because each squadron wears out 4 machines in a year. It costs $1,400,000 to run one of these squadrons and keep 12 machines in the air for a year. Now, regardless of cost, we ought to have them. We ought to build up this service. It is an instrument of warfare that we must have, and we must never be found without it. But what are the facts about it? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Crago] in his zeal tells you that we ought to teach all these boys how to fly. Why, gentlemen of the House, the Army, under the splendid direction of Gen. Squier, one of the ablest and most accomplished men in the Army, in my judgment, and certainly on this subject, is undertaking in every way under heaven to get fliers and to make the best kind of machines and the safest machines in which these fliers may fly, and yet the Army has only about 50 fliers to-day for all this vast aviation organization, costing us $9,000,000 a year.

Now, this service ought to be centralized. It is only by this method that the best fliers can be obtained, the best machines secured, and this dangerous business made the least hazardous.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.
Mr. GORDON. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that this service is so dangerous that they do not even detail men to it, but depend wholly and entirely upon volunteers?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is absolutely true.

Mr. GORDON. And make a special physical examination?
Mr. McKELLAR. Not only that, gentlemen, but under Gen,
Squier's direction they have the most painstaking examination of every piece of material that goes into every machine before they allow any man to fly in it. If we take this lump-sum appropriation and turn it over to the National Guard, we do away with this system that Gen. Squier says is absolutely necessary; that is, to have the very best possible material to go into these That was proved in the Mexican border situation, when they had a lot of machines down there that they had been using for years, and not one could climb over a mountain, and they had to start anew under Gen. Squier's direction before they could get a machine that would do it. Now they have got a proper system, and we want to build it up and help them, but do not let us start these outside matters until we build up this service in the Regular Army in the way that it ought to be built up.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to yield to the gentle-

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman talks about the best kind of material to go into these machines.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I suppose the gentleman realizes that the very best material that can be put into the aviation service is brains?

Mr. McKellar. That is true; but here is what we have got to do. We have got to establish special factories. I am talking about the War Department now under Gen. Squier. We will have to establish the factories first to put out the best kind of a machine, because we do not want to put our men in any machines except the very best and safest kind. We are now making infinitely more machines than we can get fliers for, and we have got to educate the fliers, and they ought to be educated in a way that will produce the best results and the least danger, and under one general organization.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If we have more machines than we have fliers, and if, as my colleague from Ohio [Mr. Gordon] says through the gentleman who has the floor [Mr. McKellar], the service is so hazardous that men are not detailed for it, is there not all the more reason why we should open up that service to these volunteers?

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the gentleman's proposition. It is open now to any man in this country who wants to fly and who will go before the War Department and make application. Anyone who wants the opportunity can get it now in the Regular Establishment. They are dragging this country to get fliers. The present trouble is not want of money, but want of Mr. GREENE of Vermont. By going into the regular service.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois. What does the aviation station now located at Mr. MANN. Memphis do?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has just begun.

Mr. MANN. I know it is the Chicago station moved to Memphis for the winter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But what do they do there? That is what I want to know.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are teaching young men how to fly, these civilian volunteers who come there, as I understand. It has just been started. It is hardly a system yet. They are going to keep in the service the young men who volunteer, if they are found fit to fly; they will be organized into squadrons, as provided by law.

Mr. MANN. Does a man have to enlist first?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; after he is accepted as a flier, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. Before he finds out whether he is capable or not? Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. GORDON. He has to pass an examination.
Mr. MANN. I know; but he can not pass an examination for flying before he has instruction.

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. MANN. Flyers are born, not educated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know that. Mr. MANN. That is right. Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is the truth.

Mr. McKELLAR. I must admit I am not that well up on the art of flying. I am not one myself and have no purpose to be in the near future.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will remember that Gen. Squier so testified before the committee.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman from Tennessee stated that the way was open to volunteers to enter this service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.
Mr. REAVIS. Let me tell the gentleman that Capt. McMillan, of the National Guard, who was one of the most accomplished flyers in this country, offered his services to the War Department, and they were declined unless he would leave the National Guard and go into the Regular Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not talk about individuals.

Mr. REAVIS. I know that is true, because I participated

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be that the War Department and the Army officers are not doing what they should do in this matter, but I am sure they will do the right thing if called upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. DENT. I would like to limit this debate. How much time do gentlemen want?

Mr. KAHN. I would like three minutes to put in the RECORD what Capt. Williams says about this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Three minutes will be all I will want.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto conclude in 11 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alahama asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed at the expiration of 11 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that I called upon the War Department and urged that Capt. McMillan be taken into the service, and, to further carry out the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee that great care should be observed in taking these men into the Aviation Service, I was informed by the War Department, notwithstanding that some of these men could fly, they had to take into consideration the danger of men losing their lives. I left the War Department more or less displeased that they had not taken him into the service, but within 30 days thereafter Capt. Mc-Millan fell while flying and lost his life.

So that there is something to be said on the side of the proposition the gentleman from Tennessee advances, that this is a service so dangerous and hazardous that it should be in the hands of a trained, careful, scientific department of the Regular Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with all the gentleman from Nebraska has said, and I want to say in addition that Gen. Squier, who is the chief of the bureau, told me that Congress had been very liberal with him in appropriating the amount it had this year. They have all the money they need, but they have more need for fliers than anything else. They but they have more need for fliers than anything else. have nearly $14,000,000 for the paraphernalia for flying, and They are trying everywhere to establish staonly 50 fliers. tions all over the country for the very purpose of getting fliers that can fly, and the whole matter ought to be under the control of the department that gives the service machines in which Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the door would be thrown wide open, and men like Capt. McMillan, from the State of Nebraska, would lose their lives if this loose method is adopted. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The National Guard fliers would get Government machines and be under Government direction. Mr. McKELLAR. There is no provision in this amendment

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We appropriate the money so that the Government will buy them.

Mr. McKELLAR. As a matter of fact it is only to have a larger aviation organization of the National Guard, and at present we have all the organization that is necessary in the Regular Army. What we need is trained fliers, Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This is one means of getting them.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.
Mr. RAGSDALE. The gentleman made the statement that training camps were being established all over the country. Does he know of any that has been established in any State adjoining South Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; one has recently been established in the city of Memphis, where I live.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I said adjoining South Carolina.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that Tennessee adjoins South

Mr. RAGSDALE. But not Memphis. Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this matter is a very important ne. There is no doubt about that. Capt. Williams, testifying before the Committee on Military Affairs, said that there was only one zero unit at present organized. That is in the State of New York. The others are not organized at all, but he thinks that for the purpose of the National Guard there will ultimately have to be organized 12 squadrons for the various States or National Guard divisions of the Union. Whether the men in the National Guard under the existing law can be made fliers is a problem. It requires three months of intensive training every day in the year, as I understand the situation, for a man to learn how to get into the air. It requires probably six months of intensive training before he becomes what they call an expert flier. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that before we go into this thing so thoroughly some plan should be devised so that so-called filers in the National Guard can really be made fliers.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly. Mr. BORLAND. Possibly the gentleman has been up in the air with the machines at San Diego. He understands that they reject after a week or possibly a month's training nearly 98 per cent of the men they undertake to train.

Mr. KAHN. It is very difficult, as has been suggested, to find a man who is a natural flier. All others must be eliminated, Now, it costs $20,000 for each flying machine, accessories, and spare parts. The machine itself probably costs $12,500. Unless an instructor is constantly on hand supervising the work of the flier while he is being taught, there is danger of the machine being destroyed. There is danger of the man losing his life. Unless you are thoroughly prepared to teach these men properly, the experiment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be exceedingly hazardous. I would not object to putting into the bill some legislation to provide for the proper training of men in the National Guard, but the men selected would have to be ready to give up practically six months of their time before they could become expert fliers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I doubt the advisability of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In other words, I doubt whether the National Guard as a National Guard can develop flying. The man who enlists in the National Guard does not intend to devote all his time to the National Guard. But it seems to me quite patent that there ought to be some legislation, if the law does not now permit, under which the Aviation Corps of the Army might accept the services for a limited period men who have developed into fliers-not an enlistment for a year or three years.

If a man has already shown that he is a flier, if he has shown in exhibition that he can do almost anything in a flying machine, then he ought to be permitted to furnish his services to the Government for a very limited period of time. In my judgment, the Aviation Corps should be permitted to take men temporarily to test them—not after they have enlisted in the Army, but from civil life. A flier is born, he is not made. It is true that a man born a flier can not fly without a flying education, but you may educate most of the Members in this Chamber for 40 years and they could not fly, though many of them could get in the air temporarily.

Mr. ALMON. As they frequently do. Mr. MANN. As they frequently do.

Mr. CALDWELL. And they would light just about as they

Mr. MANN. As the gentleman from New York usually does. [Laughter.] There are some people, there are a good many of them, if they were all developed, who can learn to operate a flying machine right side up, wrong side up, sideways, or any other way and feel perfectly at home, and just as much at ease at an altitude of 10,000 feet as we feel with our feet on solid earth. We ought to have a chance to get hold of those men if they are willing to be tested out, and the Aviation Corps ought to have the opportunity, if it does not now have it, of letting these men offer their services to learn and find out whether they can become fliers and then permit them to remain in the service for a limited period.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if the same logic was not presented at the time the automobile was first put out, when we had automobile schools organized all over the country to teach people how to run automobiles?

Mr. MANN. We have them now. Mr. BARNHART. And we said then that the ordinary man could not run an automobile unless he had been thoroughly schooled in it, and yet men and women and children are running automobiles everywhere. They do not all have to be geniuses. Mr. MANN. But they are not flying machines, and a great many who run automobiles really do not know how to run them. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Can the gentleman say whether at the present moment the Chief Signal Officer has or has not authority to accept unpaid-for services?

Mr. MANN. I can not say; I do not know. I enjoy a very pleasant acquaintance with Gen. Squier and I have frequently talked aviation matters with him, though I have not had the opportunity or the time to do so this winter and I am a little behind the times on the subject.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; if he can answer the gentleman's

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The department is authorized to hire or engage civilian fliers at $1,800 a year. Gen. Squier says that he has not availed himself of that. I can not find any authority for taking an aviator without any pay.

Mr. MANN. I think they clearly ought to have authority to develop flyers.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have that authority, and they can employ as many civilian fliers as they desire.

Mr. MANN. At $1,800 a year? Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is not developing fliers. Here comes along a young man who thinks that he can fly. How will he find out? Enlist in the Army? He does not want to enlist in the Army, he is not willing to do so at this time unless he can fly. do not know whether they have authority, but they ought to have authority to determine whether men can fly and to teach It may be that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARN-HART] believes that every one who can run an automobile can run a flying machine, and I shall believe that one man can do that when I see him transferred from an automobile to a flying

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I agree with everything that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] has just said, and I will support the legislation which he suggested if it is neces-Attention has been called to the fact that the law now authorizes the employment of civilian fliers at $1,800 a year. This is one branch of the military service that I believe should be centralized. I think my views upon the subject of the danger of a centralized military force are pretty well known to this House. I have never concealed them. But this is a special branch of the service, specially hazardous. It is so dangerous that no man, even in the Regular Army, will be detailed to it. They depend entirely upon volunteers who are subjected to a most rigid examination. Gen. Squier, in his testimony before the Military Affairs Committee, said that in England, with that immense military establishment which now exists there, they have just one branch of the service for fliers. Fliers are detailed from this one central branch to the different parts of the service when their services are required. The proposition, if I understand it, is to divert a part of this fund to the National Guard with a view of building up separate and distinct aviation divisions in each of the States of the Union. To that I am unalterably opposed, and I am convinced that careful investigation will convince every man that it is unwise, inexpedient, and dangerous.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not gather from the reading of the paragraph quite what the gentleman states the

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman should read the amendment. Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand the amendment simply increases the amount.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; it is an entirely new amendment.
Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, to undertake to educate fliers and to appropriate money to buy flying machines to be used by citizens in the National Guard is, it seems to me, positively ridiculous. We ought to have one branch of this service and only one. We ought to have the man we now have placed at the head of it. I helican with the formula of the head of it. the head of it, I believe. All the fliers ought to be furnished there. No man who merely wishes to prepare himself to perform his duties in case of invasion of the country as a citizen soldier ought to be permitted even to take part in learning to fly under the direction of the General Government.

The gentleman realizes the fact that in an Mr. CRAGO. aero company only a very few men take up flying, but the great question is the caring for the machines, the caring for the four or five machines necessary to keep one in the air. It is purely a mechanical thing except two, three, or four men out of an entire company who are experts. These other young men will know how to care for these machines.

Mr. GORDON. I would rather depend on a man who makes a business of it than to attempt to instruct our citizen soldiers. I thought the gentleman wanted a democratic

Mr. GORDON. I do, so far as men in the line are concerned; but I do not want any such civilian branch of the service as this. It ought not to be decentralized but centralized, as it is and its undefined relation to the submarine.

the most highly technical and dangerous branch of the military

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the fact that all of this debate has been proceeding under a reservation of the point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything to be said by the gentleman who offers the amendment?

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the point of order, as far as that is concerned. It simply makes this appropriation of $1,000,000 here instead of $76,000, which is already appropriated in this paragraph for the instruction, purchase of material and equipment necessary for the proper furchase of inaterial and equipment necessary for the proper instruction of such officers and enlisted men of the National Guard as may be authorized, increasing that amount by $924,000, making it $1,000,000. The object of that is to give them the right to buy aircraft, and so forth, and it seems to me it is entirely germane to the paragraph and subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does it give authority not now afforded; in other words, does it change existing law?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, it is new legislation. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Supplying and exchanging Infantry equipment, National Guard: For the purpose of manufacturing, procuring, exchanging, and issuing model of 1910 equipment to the Infantry and other dismounted organizations of the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia: Provided, That whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of War a sufficient number of Infantry equipment, model of 1910, shall have been procured and shall be available for the purpose the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue on the requisition of the governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general of the District of Columbia National Guard, such numbers thereof as are required for equipping the National Guard in said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, without charging the cost or value thereof or any expenses connected therewith, against any allotments to said States, Territories, or the District of Columbia, provided that the equipment thus issued shall be receipted for and shall remain the property of the United States and be annually accounted for in the manner prescribed by the act of June 3, 1916, and that each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall, upon receipt of new equipment, turn in to the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, without receiving any money credit therefor and without expense for transportation of Infantry equipment now in its possession, the property of the United States, and replaced by articles of the model of 1910 equipment, $800,000.

Mr. SWIET Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the critical juncture of our foreign relations unconsciously impels every Representative attached to the legislative branch of the Government to recognize his high sense of responsibility and to consider with sober thought and solemn reflection the accumulation of complications. Although the record of the present Congress shows that it has been imbued with lofty sentiments of the highest patriotism, and has readily and cheerfully responded to all the suggestions and recommendations of the Executive, yet in some quarters the Congress has been sharply criticized for its omission to enact positive legislation embracing vital issues emanating from crises precipitated by the European conflict. During the current month one of the metropolitan dailies openly charged that every Member of the National Legislature has violated his oath to uphold the Constitution of the United States for omission to frame definitions prescribing the lawful maneuvers of submarines on the high seas and interdicting defined unlawful operations as felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations, citing in support of such contention Article I, section 8, paragraph 10, of the Constitution, that: "The Congress shall have power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations." If the judgment of the editorial writer were adopted, the control of the foreign policy of the Nation would be withdrawn from the Executive and thrust upon the legislative branch of the Government, where numerous and contradictory opinions would be encountered and the orderly processes of a single mind succeeded by chaos and Moreover, a casual survey of the acts of our first impotency. Presidents and all our subsequent diplomatic negotiations demonstrate that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the direction of our foreign policies should be construed as the lawful prerogative of the Executive. This has been the practice of our Government from the ratification of the Constitution until this very hour, and a limited examination of the origin and interpretation of the foregoing section relating to piracies and offenses against the law of nations amply justi-fies this conclusion. As my time is necessarily limited it will be impossible to discuss minutely the three classes of high crimes and misdemeanors embodied in this portion of the Constitution, and I will therefore present a summary on the law of nations

As the common law in any particular State is established by well-defined custom and immemorial usage, so the law of nations authoritatively regarded as a part of the common law is founded upon ancient customs and usages prevailing by common consent among nations of independent political sovereignty. It is therefore limited in scope. That it is vague and uncertain is universally acknowledged, as is well evidenced by the attempts of the great powers to adjust a settlement of international differences at The Hague Peace Conferences in 1899 and 1907 and by the Declaration of London in 1909.

Mr. Justice Storey in his opinion rendered in the case of the United States against Smith stated that the-common law recognizes and punishes piracy as an offense, not against its own municipal code but as an offense against the law of nations (which is part of the common law), as an offense against the universal law of society, a pirate being deemed an enemy of the human race. Indeed, until the statute of Twenty-eighth Henry VIII, ch. 15, piracy was punished in England only as a civil-law offense; and that statute in changing the jurisdiction has been universally admitted not to have changed the nature of offense.

Offense, too, against the law of nations can not with any accuracy be said to be completely ascertained and defined in any public code recognized by the common consent of nations.

Again, in the cause of the United States against Arjona Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in discussing the crime of the counterfeiting of foreign bank notes and bills as an offense against the law of nations, declared-

There is no more need of declaring in the statute that it is such an offense than there would be in any other criminal statute to declare that it was enacted to carry into execution any other particular power vested by the Constitution in the United States Government. Whether the offense as defined is an offense against the law of nations depends on the thing done, not on any declaration to that effect by Congress.

The effectiveness and utility of the submarine was not apparent at the time of the peace conventions, and although the instructions to the first international conference embraced submarine torpedo boats, yet the subject was not seriously discussed and no agreement was sanctioned.

All the powers, however, by the subsequent construction and use of the submarine, have recognized its importance as a ves-sel of war, and while its employment as such is sanctioned by the law of nations, yet its rank remains undefined.

Therefore, as powers of equal sovereignty disagree concerning its lawful status, the nature and extent of its employment is not regulated by the law of nations, and under such circumstances a declaration by Congress would be contrary to the spirit and doctrine of the law of nations,

It is not the function of Congress to engage in the business of framing definitions, but rather to cooperate with the Executive in the enactment of any legislation deemed necessary to protect the international relations of the United States.

In the early period of our Government complete unanimity of action between the President and Congress was fostered, and it was the custom of the House and Senate to reply to important messages of the Executive.

As illustrative of the existence of this happy and fortunate relation radiant with the loftiest sentiments of true patriotism, I submit extracts from an interchange of communications during the term of our second President:

SPECIAL SESSION MESSAGE, MAY 16, 1797.

SPECIAL SESSION MESSAGE, MAY 16, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives, the present situation of our country imposes an obligation on all the departments of Government to adopt an explicit and decided conduct. In my situation an exposition of the principles by which my administration will be governed ought not to be omitted.

It is impossible to conceal from ourselves or the world what has been before observed—that endeavors have been employed to foster and establish a division between the Government and people of the United States. To investigate the causes which have encouraged this attempt is not necessary; but to repel, by decided and united councils, insimuations so derogatory to the honor and aggressions so dangerous to the Constitution, union, and even independence of the Nation is an indispensable duty.

It must not be permitted to be doubted whether the people of the United States will support the Government established by their voluntary consent and appointed by their free choice, or whether, by surrendering themselves to the direction of foreign and domestic factions, in opposition to their own Government, they will forfeit the honorable station they have hitherto maintained.

For myself, having never been indifferent to what concerned the interests of my country, devoted the best part of my life to obtain and support its independence, and constantly witnessed the patriotism, fidelity, and perseverance of my fellow citizens on the most trying occasions, it is not for me to hesitate or abandon a cause in which my heart has been so long engaged.

Convinced that the conduct of the Government has been just and impartial to foreign nations, and those internal regulations which have been established by law for the preservation of peace are in their nature proper, and that they have been fairly executed, nothing will ever be done by me to impair the national engagements, to innovate upon principles which have been so deliberately and uprightly established, or to surrender in any manner

JOHN ADAMS.

REPLY OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

We have constantly hoped that the nations of Europe, whilst desolated by foreign wars or convulsed by intestine divisions, would have left the United States to enjoy that peace and tranquillity to which the impartial conduct of our Government has entitled us, and it is now with extreme regret we find the measures of the French Republic tending to endanger a situation so desirable and interesting to our country. Upon this occasion we feel it our duty to express in the most explicit manner the sensations which the present crisis has excited and to assure you of our zealous cooperation in those measures which may appear necessary for our country in peace.

Although it is the earnest wish of our hearts that peace may be maintained with the French Republic and with all the world, yet we never will surrender those rights which belong to us as a Nation; and while we view with satisfaction the wisdom, dignity, and moderation which have marked the measures of the Supreme Executive of our country in the full force of that indignity which has been offered our country in the full force of that indignity which tempts to wound our rights as a sovereign Stor of immission. No attempts to wound our rights as a sovereign Stor of immission. No attempts to wound our rights as a sovereign Stor of immission, and degraded people; that we can never submit to the demands of a foreign power without examination and without discussion.

Knowing as we do the confidence reposed by the people of the United States in their Government, we can not hesitate in expressing our indignation at any sentiments tending to derogate from that confidence. Such sentiments, wherever entertained, serve to evince an imperfect knowledge of the opinions of our constituents. An attempt to separate the people of the United States from their Government is an attempt to separate them from ourselves; and although foreigners who know not the genius of our country may have conceived the project, and foreign emissaries may attempt the execution, yet the think with you

I cherish the hope that the observance of this custom, which I am confident will promote national unity, may be revived.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWEIL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to object to the extension of time, but I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SWIFT. I ask for only two minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to object to the gentleman's request, but I think we ought to get on with this bill. There are Members here who are interested in the bill and interested in the provisions of the bill. Some of us want to reach those provisions as soon as possible. I am deeply interested in what the gentleman is saying and he is presenting it very well, but I would like to see the committee get along if possible. withdraw my objection.

Mr. DENT. I understand the gentleman wishes only two minutes.

I only request two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWIFT, Mr. Chairman, in this hour the heart of every American citizen should be filled with loyal attachment to the Constitution of the United States. We laud our rights and privileges as American citizens but forget our obligations. We love to speak of ourselves as the "sovereign" people. Every citizen regards himself as a sovereign, but as such he must discharge all the obligations of sovereignty. I have absolute faith, trust, and confidence in the wisdom of the President of the United States. [Applause.] And whenever, in all the sacred solemnity of his exalted office, he presents to this Congress proposals to maintain the honor, dignity, and independence of the Republic and desires the enactment of specific legislation, I believe he will receive the unqualified support of every Member of the American Congress. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cox). The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

RIFLE RANGES FOR CIVILIAN INSTRUCTION.

To establish and maintain indoor and outdoor rifle ranges for the use of all able-bodied males capable of hearing arms, under reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the National Board for Promotion of Rifle Practice and approved by the Secretary of War; for the employment of labor in connection with the establishment of outdoor and indoor rifle ranges, including labor in operating targets; for the employment of instructors; for clerical services; for badges and other insignia; for the transportation of employees, instructors, and civilians to engage in practice; for the purchase of materials, supplies, and services, and for expenses incidental to instruction of citizens of the United States in marksmanship, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and to remain available until expended, $20,000.

For arms, ammunition, targets, and other accessories for target

For arms, ammunition, targets, and other accessories for target practice for issue in connection with the encouragement of rifle practice in pursuarce of the provisions of section 113 of the act approved June 3, 1916, $300,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, after line 7, insert "service badges; for badges for men who took part in the mobilization on the Mexican border, $5,000."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order unless the gentleman wishes to discuss it for one minute.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let it go, if the gentleman is going to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand there will be no objection to it if the $5,000 comes out of the $300,000 already appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are several members of the committee who will make the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Well, then, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Sears: Page 65, at the end of line 7, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, That out of said sum of $300,000 there shall be used for the payment of transportation of teams authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in the national matches, not to exceed $60,000: Provided further, That this amount shall be proportioned among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to the distance from the seat of Government to the place where the national matches are to be held: And provided further, That the governors of the States, Territories, or the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate which team or teams shall attend from their respective States, Territories, or District of Columbia."

Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I will simply read for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin the following:

The interest manifested by the militia in the national team matches is shown by the number of entries each year since the institution of those matches. Eleven State teams were represented in 1903, 19 in 1904, 32 in 1905, 37 in 1906, 43 in 1907, 45 in 1908, 38 in 1910 and in 1911, 41 in 1913, and 40 in 1915. It is observed that the maximum number of State teams represented was reached in 1908. There were no national team matches in 1912 and 1914.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me? The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. SEARS. I will.

Mr. KAHN. As a matter of fact, these matches have been held every year for a great many years prior to the present

Mr. SEARS. They have. Mr. KAHN. And the provision has invariably been put on the Army appropriation bill in the Senate, although it was not carried in the bill when it went through the House?

Mr. SEARS. That is true.

Mr. KAHN. And the conferees on the part of the House have always allowed it to remain?

Mr. SEARS. That is true.

Mr. KAHN. And this is the desire of a Member of the House to put that provision on the bill at this time?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.
Mr. STAFFORD. Is the amount anything different than what was carried in the prior bill?
Mr. SEARS. It is the same amount carried in this bill. Mr. STAFFORD. If the point of order is withdrawn, will that be sufficient without further debating the amendment? Mr. SEARS. It will.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

CIVILIAN MILITARY TRAINING.

For the expense of maintaining, upon military reservations or elsewhere, camps for the military instruction and training of such citizens as may be selected under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and for furnishing said citizens, at the expense of the United States, uniforms, subsistence, transportation by the most usual and direct route within said limits as to territory as may be prescribed; for such expenditures as may be deemed necessary for water, fuel, light, temporary structures, not including quarters for officers nor barracks for men, screening, and damages resulting from field exercises, and other expenses incidental to maintaining said camps and the theoretical winter instruction in connection therewith, including textbooks and stationery; for furnishing such equipments, tentage, field equipage, and transportation belonging to the United States as may be deemed necessary as authorized by section 54 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, $2,250,000.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman. I offer an amendment which I

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, line 11, after the word "citizens," insert "physically capable of bearing arms."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman— Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a second amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, at the end of line 2, add the following:
"Provided, That all citizens who receive instruction and training at said military instruction and training camps shall be required to drill with the National Guard at the National Guard post nearest their respective places of residence not less than 12 days each year for the two calendar years next succeeding the year in which such instruction and training was received by said citizens, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. I will reserve it, if the gentleman wishes to discuss it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Mr. FIELDS. I just wanted to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin that I reserved the right in committee to offer that amendment. I want to say this

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DENT. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, we are appropriating here $2,500,000 for the training of citizens in these civilian training We are at the same time attempting to build up the National Guard, and it seems to me that it would be the part of good business to have these men who go to the training camps and receive training under skilled Army officers come back and diffuse their knowledge among the people by drilling with the National Guard.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Supposing that the nearest National Guard unit to many of these men was something like 150 or 200 miles away, as it is in many instances, some even more.

Mr. FIELDS. Oh, well, that is not so far, in view of the fact that the Government a year before took them all to Plattsburg or some other place.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman recognize that these men at the camps train eight hours a day for 30 days, or a total of 240 hours a year, whereas the National Guardsmen train only 48 hours a year?

Mr. FIELDS. Of course, they would train with the National Guard as the National Guard trains.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] insist on his point of order?

Mr. DENT. I insist on it.
Mr. FIELDS. If my time has not expired, I want to say this: I knew this amendment would not be accepted. I offered it for the purpose of calling the hand of some who have contended with me privately that we do not have authority to require the National Guard to drill with these men. I hoped that I might draw from members of the committee here on the floor of the House these same statements that have been made to me privately, that we did not have authority to require the National Guard to drill with these men. I offered the amendment in the hope that I might put those gentlemen on record on that question, but they seem to remain silent. However, if that is true it only strengthens the contention that I have made all the time, that we have not federalized the National Guard in the national-defense act that we passed last year. That was my object in offering this amendment.

Mr. DENT. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

For arms and ordnance equipment, including overhauling and repairing of personal equipments, machine-gun outfits, horse equipment, etc., ammunition, targets, and other accessories for target practice, and for overhauling and repairing arms for issue and use in connection with training camps for civilians in pursuance of the provisions of section 54 of the act approved June 3, 1916, $250,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 5, page 66, the words "and so forth."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 66, in line 5, by striking out the words "and so forth."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 10, page 66, the figures "$250,000" and insert "$310,000."

CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 10, page 66, by striking out the figures "$250,000" and inserting "$310,000."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will say in support of my amendment that this is the amount of money that was requested by the department and it is in my opinion necessary for the equipment of the National Guard. All of the things that I have said in connection with the other increases that we have offered amendments for apply here. I think it ought to be agreed to, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all the language on page 66, beginning with line 11 and ending with the word "plant," in line 23, be stricken from the bill. I ask that it be considered as no part of the bill, and that it be not read as part of the bill.

In explanation of that request I want to make this statement: This involves what is known as the Taylor system. vision was in the appropriation bill that was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. A motion was made in the committee to strike this proviso out of the bill. There was a roll call in the committee, and on that roll call a majority of the committee voted to strike it out. In drafting the bill that I, as chairman of the committee, reported to the House, the clerk to the committee failed to run his pen through those lines in the print of the bill as used in the committee. Of course I used the form of the bill we had, tacking on in typewriting such amendments as we agreed to and striking out such items as were rejected. The committee struck this out, although I voted the That was the action of the committee. other way.

I hope there will be no objection to that being taken out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the language indicated be not considered as a part of the bill on the ground that it was erroneously included originally therein on the part of the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman-I have no desire to object to this request, but I want to know where it will lead us in a parliamentary way. Suppose we grant this request and eliminate this proviso from the bill. Will it then be in order for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] to offer the same proviso as an amendment to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. If the request of the gentleman from Alabama is agreed to in the form in which it has been put by the Chair, it will.

Mr. KEATING. Another inquiry: In case the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois should be voted down in committee, when the bill comes into the House will the request of the gentleman from Alabama be regarded as an amendment upon which a separate vote may be secured in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. No; because the Chair carefully stated that it would not be in the form of an amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Then I must object. I have no objection to the gentleman striking out the proviso; I have no objection to granting the unanimous-consent request that will eliminate it from the bill and make it necessary for the gentleman from Illinois to present the amendment. But the point I want to safeguard is that when we come into the House we may have a record vote, because, as the Chairman knows, this matter has been passed upon in the House on quite a number of occasions, Two or three times in the present Congress we have had record votes on the proposition, and before we reject the policy that has been approved by the House I feel we ought to have a record

Mr. DENT. That is all true; but certainly the gentleman will not object to the RECORD stating the true facts. I ask, as chairman of the committee, that the Record should state the true and real facts. I have no objection, and I had supposed that if this request were granted the gentleman from Illinois would immediately offer this as an amendment at this point.

Mr. KEATING. I have no objection to the gentleman striking the amendment from the bill, but I must insist upon its being taken out as an amendment.

Mr. DENT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move, as a committee amendment, that that language be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the language indicated be stricken from the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has not yet been reported. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 66, by striking out the language of the proviso:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States while making or causing to be made, with a stop watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alahama [Mr. Dent]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] moves, as an amendment, to strike out that paragraph. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the members of the Military Affairs Committee have felt called upon to offer this amendment.

The question presented in the proviso has been thrashed out in this House at various times during the last four years. in this House at various times during the last four years. House has gone on record, not once but some six or eight times, in favor of the adoption of this so-called "antistop-watch proviso. It is now on the naval bill. It is on the fortifications bill, and I understand has been adopted by the Senate. During the last session it was placed upon four appropriation bills and agreed to by the Senate.

It seems to me that the members of the various committees of the House should feel bound to a certain extent by the mandate of the House, and after a subject like this has been thoroughly discussed and the House has gone upon record the committee should not come here and insist upon reopening the entire subject and wasting the time of the House.

There is absolutely nothing new before the House. The Com-There is absolutely nothing new before the House. The Committee on Military Affairs does not pretend that it has thrown this subject open for full hearings. It is true that Gen. Crozier came before the committee and said, what he has repeatedly said before, that he favored the Taylor system; but, so far as I know, no one has been given an opportunity to refute what Gen. Crozier said, so that the matter is just where it was when the House last voted upon it, and, on a record vote, by a very substantial majority, decided to keep this amendment not only in this bill but in three other bills.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the practical operation of this proviso: When we first attached this proviso to the naval bill the Secretary of the Navy immediately issued orders that all his subordinates should in good faith comply with the proviso, and for the last two years all the navy yards and shipyards under the control of the Government have been conducted on this basis. The stop watch, bonus, and premium system have been eliminated from these Government institutions, and, so far as the record shows, the representatives of the Navy Department are not here asking that this system be restored. So far as I know, the only prominent official of the Government who clamors for the establishment of the stop-watch system and the bonus and premium system is Gen. Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. I notice in lines 20 and 21 it also speaks of cash reward in addition to premium and bonus. How does the gentleman interpret that?

Mr. KEATING. I presume that the amendment is the exact amendment which has been attached to other bills.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not recall that language being in the naval bill.

Mr. KEATING. It is in the naval bill.

Mr. KELLEY. In those words? Mr. TAVENNER. In those exact words.

Mr. KEATING. In those exact words, I am informed, and that has been interpreted in the Navy Department as permitting the piecework system to be adopted, permitting the grading of various employees, so that one employee may secure a higher wage than another employee who is engaged in the same line of work, and has in every way, so far as this House has been informed, proved entirely satisfactory. But the main point is that this Congress is on record as in favor of this proviso; and I submit again that when the House has thrashed out a subject like this and has determined upon a policy it is the duty of the various committees to take cognizance of that fact and to bring into this House a proviso that the House has instructed them to bring in; or, failing that, to proceed to hold such hearings as will permit the supporters as well as the opponents of legislation to be heard. And, so far as this particular legislation is concerned, only Gen. Crozier has been heard by the Military Affairs Committee, and this committee has made no attempt to hear the other side.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close at the expiration of six minutes.

Mr. BROWNE. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have five minutes upon it.

Mr. DENT. This is simply a motion to carry out the will of the Military Affairs Committee. It is not on the merits of the proposition one way or the other, and I hope the gentleman will not take the time to discuss the merits or demerits of the

Mr. BROWNE. I am in favor of carrying out the request of the Military Affairs Committee; but my friend from Colorado [Mr. Keating] has gone into the matter on the merits, and I think it ought to be discussed at least 5, 10, or 15 minutes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope the chairman of the committee will try to hold down the time as much as possible. If there is going to be general debate on this, the members of the Military Affairs Committee will find it necessary to take the floor to explain why they took this action; and, in order to get through with this bill, we prefer not to do it.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman would prefer not to do what? Mr. McKENZIE. Not to take the time of the committee in explaining why the Military Affairs Committee took the action it did.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie] is good. I hope the gentlemen will just vote on it and not make speeches.

Mr. GORDON. I am going to be heard in opposition to what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keating] has said.

Mr. DENT. As I understand the rule, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gordon], who is opposed to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keating], would be entitled to five minutes under the rule anyhow.

I give notice that at the expiration of that five minutes I shall move to close the debate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Gallivan having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19119) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments still in disagreement, had agreed to a further conference with the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. Bryan and Mr. Weeks be added to the conferees on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 206. Joint resolution extending until January 8, 1918, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914. The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19300) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Overman, Mr. Lea of Tennessee, and Mr. Jones as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President had, on February 20, 1917, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 809. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the application for land entry of Richard Daeley; S. 1361. An act for the relief of Thomas Smart; S. 1378. An act to amend the military record of John P. Fitz-

S. 2749. An act for the relief of George L. Thomas;

S. 3699. An act to donate to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for park purposes the tract of land known as the powder-house

S. 1061. An act to allow additional entries under the enlarged homestead act;

S. 5424. An act to construct a bridge in San Juan County, State of New Mexico; and

S. 7486. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ARMY APPROPRIATION RILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is characteristic of the methods of these gentlemen who have been forcing this legislation on this Government. He says that nobody except Gen. Crozier had a hearing on this question. I myself inserted in the RECORD day before yesterday a letter from the gentleman who had this legislation written into our law, the legislative agent here who has promoted this legislation and who is solely entitled to the credit for pulling the strings on these fellows who have been voting it into these appropriation bills. He I had not time to discuss it with him, and I said to him, "Give me your views upon it in writing and I will consider them." I have not only considered them but I inserted them in the RECORD, together with Gen. Crozier's reply to the

Now, is it fair to say to this House that any advantage has been taken of the proponents of this proposition to hamstring the Government? I say it is not. He says there is nothing new in this. Let me call your attention to the undisputed fact that last August this House, at the dictate of these people, inserted a prohibition against the use of the time study and premium payments. What was the result? The result was that at the Watertown Arsenal, where 50 per cent of the work was done under that system, by striking it out you increased the cost to the Government two and two-tenths times. Nobody has dis-

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GORDON. I will not. Mr. KEATING. I want to say——

Mr. GORDON. I will not.

Mr. KEATING. I want to say that I dispute it.

The gentleman has been on the floor and has Mr. GORDON. read Gen. Crozier's testimony, and he heard the speech that I made the other day in which I charged the same thing, and he does not present any evidence, and there has not a particle of evidence been adduced to refute what Gen. Crozier testified to. As a matter of fact, Gen. Crozier and the man in charge of that work are the only people who actually know, or have the means of knowing, and they have produced the figures proving the increased cost by prohibiting the efficiency system to be 2.2 times. Not only that, the records in the arsenal show that by the introduction of this system they reduced the cost of production 2.7 from what it had been before this system was introduced. You tell me that in the expenditure of millions of dollars of Government funds that you will prohibit the Government from resorting to the only means available to have the arsenals run efficiently. I say it is an outrage and a disgrace to the American Congress. [Applause.] The practical opera-tion of these arsenals under the prohibition of the use of this system ought to be a sufficient argument for every honest man to vote for this amendment. You have no business to take the Government funds and throw them away. This legislation does not affect private firms; it simply affects the manner in which the Government work is done. I say to you that men in this Congress are here acting as the representatives and trustees for the public, and I undertake to say that they have no right to disregard the testimony of the men who are in charge of this work, who are responsible for the results of that work, who are responsible for the reasonable efficiency of the labor of thousands of men in the employ of the Government in the most critical time of the world's history, when we are seeking by every reasonable means to utilize every energy it has to prepare itself against a possible invasion.

It seems to me that regardless of how you may have voted before, regardless of gentlemen here who assume to take charge of the labor interests of this country, you ought to consider what the result has been and vote on the question with the chairman of the committee to strike out the provision. unfairness of these gentlemen is illustrated by the fact that they refused to consent to strike it out when they were informed that on a roll call in the committee we did strike it out. Our committee took formal action, and on a roll call it did strike it out. It was inserted by inadvertence, and I say that every man in this House as a matter of good faith ought now to vote to strike it out.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. KEATING. May I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment be again reported?

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is to close debate on the paragraph and all amendments

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment gentleman from Alabama to strike out the section of the indicated.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Keating) there were 82 ayes and 33 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That section 15 of the act of June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," be amended so as to read as follows: "The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, chaplains in the Army at the rate of not to exceed, including chaplains now in service, one for each regiment of Cavairy, Infantry, Field Artillery, and Engineers, and one for each 1,200 officers and men of the Coast Artillery Corps, with rank, pay, and allowances as now authorized by law."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 70, line 23, after the word "Provided," strike out the word "further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That section 24 of the act of June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," be amended so as to add the following proviso: "That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to waive the age limit in all cases where the candidate for second lieutenant, who, being within the maximum age limit at the date of examination, has passed or may pass the examination, and who has become, or may become, ineligible on account of age before the date of his appointment, and to appoint such candidate with rank from the same date as other candidates of like class who have been or may be appointed as the result of the same examination: Provided, That such appointment is made within one year from the date of such examination."

Mr. MANN. It is not yet offered, but only read for information.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I would like to have read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning on page 71, strike out the proviso beginning after the word That," in line 10, down to the word "proviso," in line 14, and insert

"That," in line 10, down to the word "proviso," in line 14, and insert the following:

"The first part of the second paragraph of section 24 of the act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, approved June 3, 1916, down to the first proviso in said paragraph, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant created or caused by the increases due to this act, in any fiscal year shall be filled by appointment in the following order: (1) Of cadets graduated from the United States Military Academy during the preceding fiscal year for whom vacancies did not become available during the fiscal year in which they were graduated; (2) under the provisions of existing law, of enlisted men, including officers of Philippine Scouts, whose fitness for promotion shall have been determined by competitive examination, and of members, including officers, of the Organized Militia, the National Guard, or Naval Militia, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, who have had at least 90 days' actual Federal military service under any call of the President during the calendar year 1916, and whose fitness for promotion shall have been determined by examination; (3) of members of the Officers' Reserve Corps between the ages of 21 and 27 years, of distinguished colleges as are now or may hereafter be entitled to preference by general orders of the War Department; and (6) of candidates from civil life between the ages of 21 and 27 years; and the President is authorized to make the necessary rules and regulations to carry these provisions into effect: Provided."

The CHAIRMAN. These two amendments are now before the

The CHAIRMAN. These two amendments are now before the committee for information, and the paragraph is subject to a reservation of a point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire an opportunity to explain his amendment?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE], if he desires to explain his, would first be entitled to recognition

Mr. TAGUE. I yielded to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is the wording of a bill reported in another legislative body by the Military Committee of that body. It reenacts the language of section 24 of the national-defense act prescribing who may be appointed second lieutenant. The only change in the wording is that the age limit of these men who have served 90 days' actual service with the colors shall be raised to 30 years. In other words, a with the colors shall be raised to 30 years. In other words a militia officer under 30 years who has actually had 90 days' service is entitled to take the examination. That is the only change made by this act. Then it proceeds to incorporate the remainder of this paragraph, which provides as the committee has provided, that men who took the examination when they were under age but whose examination was not reported until they have passed the maximum age should, nevertheless, be subject to appointment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a minute. The committee amendment is absolutely fair, and it ought to be adopted. The War Department conducted examinations here of a lot of young men who were under 27 years at the time the examination occurred, but who before the examination was reported had passed the twenty-seventh year and were in their twenty-eighth year. They had been examined and had gone to great expense and trouble and delay and loss of time in doing so, and they had a right to be appointed. The delay was not their fault, but they could not be appointed because the age limit was arbitrary, so that I say the committee amendment ought to be adopted in any case, whether mine is or not. But my amendment has met the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs of a coordinate branch of the Government. It raises the age limit from 27 years to 30 years of militia officers who have served 90 days with the colors. Everybody who knows the militia knows that any good first or second lieutenant or captain with the militia is a man between the years of 25 and 30. Very few of the men who have had any experience sufficient to qualify them to take examination and pass it with credit, and who serve with ability, are under 27 years of age. That limit is unfortunate and unjust, so far as these men are concerned, and I do not think Congress is going to do any harm, in fact, I think it is going to do a great deal of good, by increasing the age limit to 30 years-that is, of men who have served in the militia.

The law provides 30 years now for men who come up as enlisted men from the ranks, because it is admitted that a man who must get his training in that way will have reached an older stage in life than the man who got his training in some more fortunate way. And so it runs. A man may be appointed second lieutenant who comes up from the ranks at any time before he is 30, and I seek to apply that same rule to a man who comes up from the ranks of the Organized Militia. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As I understand from the Clerk's reading, the gentleman's amendment provides that officers and enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, I am simply repeating the words of the defense law. There is no change in that,

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There must be, because an enlisted man the Philippine Scouts is a native Filipino.

Mr. BORLAND. I am simply repeating the words of the national-defense law.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman's amendment provide that the men shall have at least three years' service in the National

Mr. BORLAND. No; it provides that he shall have served at least 90 days under the call of the President.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, it simply applies to those who serve 90 days under the President's call?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the 90 days' service thought to be the equivalent of the three years, so that a man who serves the 90 days, even if he were three years older than the 27 years, would be eligible?

Mr. BORLAND. I take it so. We appoint men from civil life who have had no service anywhere, if they are under 27, who pass an examination.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, the idea is that they do not want to raise to senior rank men of too advanced age.

Mr. BORLAND. Thirty years is the standard for enlisted men, and it ought to be the standard of men who come up from the National Guard, whereas 27 years ought to be the standard for men who have had no experience in the Regular service or the National Guard.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. At the present time if an officer is married— Mr. BORLAND. I understand that is the disqualification.

Would the gentleman object to an amendment to the effect that the fact that such officer was married would not be a bar to his being examined and commissioned?

Mr. BORLAND. I should not object, of course, but I do hope that there will not be any point of order made against this paragraph. I know personally of the injustice that was caused by the very proper and sensible action of the War Department, but still it caused injustice and it ought to be remedied at this The committee amendment ought to be adopted, but I think mine ought to be adopted also.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri

has expired.

Mr. TAGUE rose. Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes, to be used by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE], all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto shall be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by me is one that will give a chance and an opportunity to the men now serving in the Philippine Scouts to get into the Regular Army service as officers. There are at the present time, acting as officers, captains and lieutenants doing duty as scout officers in the Philippines—52 captains, 65 first and 65 second lieutenants. Now, these men are not eligible to go into the service of the Government in the Regular Army because most of them, if not all of them, have reached the age that is prescribed by law wherein they are not allowed to take an examination. All of these men have risen from the ranks. Most of them have served from 12 to 20 years and have worked up during their service until they have attained the highest rank they could reach in the Regular Army service. Then because of their efficiency and because of their qualifications they have been appointed to act in the capacity of training as soldiers the natives of the Philippine Islands and are performing a great work on behalf of this Government.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why does not the gentleman include the officers of the Philippine Constabulary?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, there is quite a distinction between the constabulary and the Philippine Scouts, Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; the constabulary

Mr. TAGUE. The constabulary are a police force.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No. Mr. TAGUE. I may be mistaken, but I understand so; but these men are Regular Army men and come within the provisions of this bill. They are in the service, have taken the examination for promotion that is prescribed by law, and every one of them with a few exceptions have served more than four years as officers in Regular Army service of the Government. I believe in justice to them that if we are going to make the Army and Navy of the United States what it ought to be we should give to the men in the ranks an opportunity to advance into the high offices. Some of the best men who have served as officers in the Army and the Navy of the United States have risen from the ranks, and were chosen because of their fighting qualities. They have been trained the way they ought to have been trained. They have become by their own efforts so efficient that they are able to take the examinations and pass them as required by the They have met all the qualifications that the law Government. demands. They are first-class soldiers and are qualified to fill the place as officers in these different companies. They have trained the men of the Philippines until they have become a valuable part of our Army service, and their work is unlike that of any other service in our Government. They are entitled to some consideration, I submit, Mr. Chairman. They are entitled to an opportunity to go into the Regular Army as officers. And now that they have performed this faithful service, now that they have given the best years of their life to the Government, and are qualified to fill these positions, they should be permitted to go into it, no matter what their age is, so long as they meet the qualifications required by the War Department. It would be a different proposition, Mr. Chairman, if it was that they were to be picked from private life at the age suggested in my amendment; but it is not so. They have been there, most of them, since they were 18 or 19 years of age. They have worked up all the way from one rating to another, and after they have reached the highest rate in the ranks in the Regular Army as private soldiers, because of efficiency, because of qualifications which they possessed, they were advanced to the rank of second and first lieutenants and then to a captaincy. These scout officers in the Philippines are doing an important work, practically the same work as the Regular Army officers, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that they should be given fair play and justice at the hands of this Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent I may have four minutes on this amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I think an order has been made limiting the time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That can be changed by unani-

How much time does the gentleman want? Mr. DENT.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Four minutes. Mr. DENT. I understand the gentleman from Illinois has reserved a point of order

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I will say I desire this time for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs a bill which I introduced along the line of the amendment which has just been offered, and I think a little discussion will be a good thing. It is not simply an opportunity to talk, but an opportunity for presenting some facts which I think the committee ought to have.

Mr. DENT. Can not the gentleman wait until they read the next paragraph?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will if the gentleman will promise that I shall have the time then.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I am bound to state that it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will withhold his point of Mr. MANN. I have made the point of order.

Mr. DENT. This is put in on the recommendation of the Secretary of War, but it is certainly new legislation and subject to the point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, at present—
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to the point of order?

Mr. McKELLAR. I rise to ask unanimous consent. The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, now I ask unanimous consent to reinstate the paragraph beginning on line 10, page 71. and ending with line 24 on the same page, it not to be subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to restore the paragraph indicated, the same when thus restored not to be subject to amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and that action is taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the following language of section 5 of the act of June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," to wit: "Not more than one-half of all of the officers detailed in said corps shall at any time be stationed, or assigned to or employed upon any duty, in or near the District of Columbia," be amended so as to authorize the President to suspend the operation of the same in the event of actual or threatened war or similar emergency in which the public safety demands it.

Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. Mr. MADDEN. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. Madden: Amend by adding after the word "it," on line 11, page 72, the following:

"Provided further, That the General Staff Corps shall consist of one Chief of Staff, who shall be a general officer of the line and who shall take rank and precedence over all other officers of the line; 10 colonels; Clief of Staff, who shall be general officer of the line; 10 colonels; Clief of Staff, who shall be general officers of the line; 10 colonels; Ill entocant colonels; Clief and Saff Captains, to be detailed from corresponding gedealed to the General Staff Corps shall be detailed from corresponding gedealed to the General Staff Corps shall be detailed to the General Staff Corps shall be detailed to the General Staff Corps shall be detailed in the General Staff Corps shall return to the branch of the Army; I which they hold permanent commissions, and no officer shall be eligible for a further detail in the General Staff Corps until he shall have served two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in time of actual or threatened hostilities. Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against

Mr. MADDEN. I submit it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. DENT. I have made the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to argue the point of order, then, In the first place

Mr. DENT. I make the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to argue the point of order.

Mr. DENT. I am not cutting the gentleman off. I am taking the opportunity of making the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the item to which this is proposed as an amendment is itself subject to a point of order; and the rules of the House provide that where an amendment is offered to an item which is in itself subject to a point of order make the item offered in order, if germane. For, if the House admits the right of consideration of any paragraph or any portion of a paragraph that is not in order it must be conceded that an amendment otherwise subject to a point of order would be in order to that paragraph. There can be no question about that. That is the universal practice. It has been the rule of the House. It has been held by every presiding officer of the House on all occasions. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this in face of the fact that the provisions in the bill to which it is proposed as an amendment is itself subject to a point of order makes this amendment in order.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Notwithstanding the original proposition is new legislation, this amendment is not germane to the distinct and separate proposition provided for in the bill. The provision is that the President may suspend language in section 5 of the national-defense act, under certain contingencies.

Mr. MADDEN. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that this is germane in the first instance; that it deals with the General Staff, and the provision to which it is proposed as an amendment is a provision which itself deals exclusively with the General Staff. To-day the General Staff consists of 55 men, only one-half of whom are permitted to serve in Washington, at headquarters. And the proposal of the committee is to change the law so as to permit the whole of the General Staff to serve at headquarters. And my proposition is to so amend the amendment of the committee as to make the General Staff not 55 but 92.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask 'a question for his information. Then, does the Chair understand that the illegal matter in this paragraph is contained in lines 8, 9, 10, and 11?

Is the Chair correct in that?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not understand the Chair's question. The CHAIRMAN. That portion of the paragraph which is out of order-I will put in in this way-is contained in lines 8, 9, 10, and 11. In other words, if those lines did not appear in this paragraph, would it be contended that the paragraph would otherwise be out of order?

Mr. MADDEN. The paragraph would probably not be out of order. If the item running from lines 1 to 11, inclusive, did not propose to amend the law—to change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The only offending portion of that paragraph is found in lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, is it not? The Chair just wants to get at the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not make any difference what lines the change of law is found in. The mere fact that it is a change of law makes it subject to a point of order in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that perfectly well, that if any part of a paragraph has offending matter in it, it makes the whole paragraph out of order, but a paragraph may be composed of matter that is in order and matter which is out of order. Now what portion of this paragraph is out of order, or does the gentleman contend that all of it is out of order?

Mr. MADDEN. My contention is that every line in the paragraph is out of order because of the proposed amendment to the law, and therefore that any other amendment dealing with the same subject is in order if that is held to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the proposed amendment is to lines 8, 9, 10, and 11?

Mr. MADDEN. It does not make any difference where it is. The Chair knows where it is as well as I do.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama what part of this paragraph contains the proposed amending matter?

Mr. DENT. It proposes simply to amend that portion of section 5 which reads specifically as follows:

Not more than one-half of all of the officers detailed in said corps shall at any time be stationed or assigned to or employed upon any duty in or near the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the existing law?

Mr. DENT. That is the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The amending matter is found in lines 8, 9, 10, and 11. Is that correct? Mr. DENT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair was trying to ascertain

Mr. DENT. It authorizes the President to suspend the operation of that language.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, the amendment proposes to authorize 55 members of the General Staff to be on duty at the War Department instead of one-half that number. That is what it proposes. And I propose to increase the General Staff from 55 to 92 and have them all on duty at the War Depart-

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit? Does not the gentleman's amendment go much further than what the gentleman offering the amendment has just stated? I followed his amendment very closely, and while it more or less follows the language in the reorganization act in section 5, it modifies it in many particulars by leaving out many provisos and paragraphs of section 5.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish the gentleman from Alabama would withhold his point of order for five minutes and let me make a statement on the merits of this question. I have not asked for any time in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DENT. I shall not object. Mr. MADDEN. I want to make a statement on the merits of the question. The gentleman has decided to reserve the point of order.

The introduction of this amendment by me is due principally to the fact that the Secretary of War believes he ought to have 92 members of the General Staff instead of 55, and it is due to the further fact that the statement was made on the floor of the House several days ago that no communication whatever was received by any member of the Committee on Military Affairs from the Secretary of War with respect to his desire for an increase in the General Staff. It is due also to the further fact that it was charged a member of the press, sitting in the press gallery, made an erroneous statement as to the facts in the case. I want, for the information of the House, now to state what I believe the facts, and to state further that I believe the young man who wrote the story in connection with this proposition when it was before the House before wrote the story based upon the facts in the case.

I have a copy of a letter here from the Secretary of War, said to have been written to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs under date of January 9, 1917, in which he

I have the honor to transmit herewith draft of legislation to carry out certain amendments in the national-defense act which were discussed by the Chief of Staff in his hearing before the House Military Committee. I wish to especially call your attention to the increase recommended in the General Staff Corps in the draft of legislation herewith, and to emphasize particularly the great necessity existing for the increase therein recommended. At the time of the creation of the General Staff Corps the number of officers first detailed thereto was fixed at 45 as the proper number to perform this new and somewhat experimental duty. In 1912 the General Staff was reduced by one general officer and eight captains. This reduction so seriously interfered with the work of the General Staff as to cause a special emphasis to be laid by the department in its recommendation to Congress on the subject. The national-defense act increased the total number on the General Staff from 36 to 55, an increase of 10 over the original number provided by the organic act, but it included a restriction that not more than one-half of the General Staff could be maintained on duty on the War Department General Staff. This restriction, as well as other restrictions pointed out by the Chief of Staff in his hearing before your committee, especially hampers the work of the General Staff and should be removed. Actual experience extending over a period of 13 years has shown conclusively that the personnel originally provided in the organic act was not, and the increased personnel provided in the national-defense act will not, be able to properly perform the comprehensive duties assigned by law to the General Staff Corps. In my judgment the number should be fixed at 92, as was recommended by the Chief of Staff and as was given in the national-defense act as passed by the Senate.

I would also invite your attention to the draft of legislation herewith, authorizing the President to restrict the publication of certain information.

And so forth.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the fact that this letter was sent to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs by the Secretary of War, accompanied by the amendment which I have just proposed, justified the article which was written in connection with the controversy that arose about this matter, and that the young man who wrote the news article for the Chicago Tribune did nothing but his simple duty. And I want to say these words as a matter of justice to him.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do you think he did his duty when he accused the members of the Committee on Military Affairs of being traitors to the country?

Mr. MADDEN. He did not do that. That was an editorial. I am referring only to the news article written by a member of the press gallery. I do not approve of the editorial. There ought not to be any such charge made; but the statement was made on the floor of the House that the man who wrote the news article did not tell the truth; that he ought to be expelled from the press gallery. But I maintain from the facts of the record that he told the truth, and he ought to be apologized to for what was said against him.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FIELDS. The statement was made in the news article that the question of raising the staff was before the committee. The question of raising the staff to 52 was not before the committee and was not discussed by the committee, as the gentle-man from California [Mr. Kahn] said, and therefore the statement was incorrect.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement was justified on the face of the letter sent by the Secretary of War to the committee.

Mr. FIELDS. The Secretary of War did not come before the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. He sent the letter. You admit that? Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman has said it was. We had no knowledge that it had been.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the chairman of the committee admit that the Secretary of War sent a letter to him?

Mr. DENT. Certainly; I admit that the Secretary of War not only wrote me, making a recommendation in accordance with the recommendation of the General Staff that the staff be increased to 92, but in addition to that he asked me when I was in his office, and he came to my office and asked me if I would submit that proposition to the committee. I stated to the Secretary that I would submit the proposition to the committee if he insisted upon it, but I did not think it could pass; that this whole subject had been thrashed out last year when we had the Army bill up, and I did not think there was any possibility of getting it through; and by way of counter-suggestion I said to the Secretary of War that I believed the committee would be perfectly willing to adopt this proposition that we now have in the bill. I made that suggestion, and the Secretary said to me, "That is perfectly satisfactory to me, although it may not be to the General Staff." I said to the Secretary, "If it is satisfactory to you, that is all I want." And I stated that to the committee. I stated to the committee that this proposition was suggested by the Secretary of War at the suggestion of the General Staff, and my suggestion as to the compromise measure was unanimously agreed to and reported by the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I want the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee to understand distinctly that I am not trying to embarrass anybody. I am simply standing in my place on the floor of the House to defend a young man who, I believe, honestly reported the facts as he understood them, and I am doing it because he has no right to the floor to defend himself.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the young man he speaks of called me up after this matter was aired on the floor of the House the other day. If I had had my way it would not have been brought to the attention of the House. He called me up and asked me if the Secretary of War said anything to me in my office on the subject, and I told him that I declined to discuss that question with him because that was a private interview with the Secretary of War that I had in my committee room before the committee met. He said he had gotten the information that the Secretary of War had been to see me and made this request, that he had received the information from very reliable sources. I said to the representative of the Tribune that so far as he was concerned I had no controversy with him on the subject, except that wherever he may have gotten the fact that the Secretary of War talked to me confidentially about it, it did not come from my office, and I did not believe it came from the Secretary of War, but from some other source.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I have said all that ought to be said upon the subject, except that I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] will withdraw his point of order when the time comes, after this discussion ends.

Mr. DENT. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I just want three minutes upon the merits of this case. I will say at the outset that I was not present at the committee meeting; so I did not know as to all the facts that have been brought out here. But as to the merits of the matter, as to the number of members of the General Staff, I want to submit these facts: The Chief of Staff came before our committee and asked for a General Staff of 92 members, as the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. Madden] has indicated. He gave us figures showing the numbers of the general staff of the Army of France and of Germany. Upon his own statement, France had 132 general-staff officers serving with the war department. We proposed in this bill to allow 55 members of the General Staff with the War Department at Washington, if the Secretary of War desires them. France had 750,000 men in her army when the war started. We have a little over 100,000. In other words, we propose in this bill to allow four times as many General Staff officers in proportion to our number of troops as France allowed. Germany, according to the statement of Gen. Scott, had 113 regular staff officers with the war department when the war started and had over 800,000 troops. In other words, we propose in this bill over five times as many staff officers serving with the War Department in proportion to the number of troops as Germany allowed at the beginning of the European war.

In addition to that I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I published in the RECORD a day or two ago a statement furnished to me by the General Staff themselves, showing that on February 15, after eight months of operation of the present law, they were still short 12 members of the General Staff that they were allowed to appoint under that law, five short in Washington and seven short outside of Washington; so that if they are short of General Staff officers here in Washington it is the War Department that is to blame and not the committee; and in the amendment proposed by the committee we are granting a great deal larger proportion of General Staff officers serving here in Washington, compared to the number of men in the Army, than any other nation has in its army under similar conditions.

The committee believed that we needed officers out fulfilling their duty with troops in the field rather than filling soft positions, with the accompanying allowances, here at the Capital.

Mr. MADDEN. If they have not been able to keep here all the officers who were authorized-

Mr. DENT. They lack five here in Washington.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They lack five here in Washington and seven outside of Washington.

Mr. DENT. Under the present arrangement they lack five, I believe. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The chief difficulty that the Chair has had in this matter has been the difficulty in arriving at the facts necessary for a decision. The gentleman from Illinois seeks to bring this amendment within the rule relative to perfecting by amendment a paragraph, originally not in order, but which has become in order by the failure to raise the question of order. The existing law which the paragraph in the bill proposes to suspend is as follows:

Not more than one-half of all of the officers detailed in said corps shall at any time be stationed or assigned to or employed upon any duty in or near the District of Columbia.

The language found in lines 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the amending paragraph is intended to suspend the operation of the above cited law, under certain prescribed conditions. Should the paragraph containing this language remain in the bill, the President in time of actual war, or in an emergency will have authority to call all of the detailed officers to Washington. An amendment germane to this particular proposition would be one providing, for instance, that some number of detailed officers, less than the total might be stationed or employed, in, or near the District of Columbia. Other germane amendments will naturally suggest themselves. But the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is not limited to affecting or controlling the number of officers that may be assigned to duty in, or near the District of Columbia. It proposes a comprehensive scheme of legislation in the guise of a perfecting amendment, and falls within the following principle:

To a bill amending a general law on a specific point, an amendment relating to the terms of the law, rather than to those of the bill, was offered and ruled not to be germane. (5 Hinds', sec. —.)

It also falls within this principle:

A paragraph which proposes legislation in a general appropriation bill being permitted to remain, may be perfected by a germane amend-ment, but this does not permit an amendment which contains addi-tional legislation. (Rules of House, sec. 824.)

Assuredly the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois contains a large amount of additional legislation.

The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That on the sale or other disposal, in accordance with law and regulations, of the United States Army transports Meade and Orook, the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized, on request of the Secretary of War to issue to either or both of said vessels a register as a vessel of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to a paragraph which we have passed, but which I think the gentleman will accept, in reference to the President suspending the operation of a law with respect to the General Staff provision in the event of actual or threatened war "or similar emergency." I suggest to the gentleman that we strike out the word "similar" and insert in lieu thereof the word "other." It seems to me it is rather dangerous at the present time to cause the President to say that an emergency "similar" to threatened war is upon us if he desires to make this change.

Mr. DENT. I should be very glad to accept that.

Mr. MANN. Then, I ask unanimous consent to return to that paragraph to offer an amendment to strike out the word "similar," in line 10, page 72, and insert in lieu thereof the word "other."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 72, line 10, strike out the word "similar" and insert in lieu thereof the word "other."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do so that I may have a few minutes to speak in reference to the proposition submitted a few moments ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Tague]. The amendment which he offered to the paragraph which was held to be subject of the point of order provided that the age limit respecting Philippine scout officers should be raised in their behalf. I want to add to that that it would be advisable to increase the age limit in respect to the constabulary officers in the Philippine Islands at the same time, and to urge that the Committee on Military Affairs give consideration to this suggestion, because I believe it is of great importance.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Did I understand the gentleman to suggest that the Military Committee give consideration to the Philippine Constabulary officers?
Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. DENT. What jurisdiction has that committee over the constabulary officers in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That committee has nearly as much jurisdiction over them as it has over the scout officers. They are both citizens of the United States. The gentleman will get my point of view in a minute. A year ago, when the general act was up reorganizing the Army, I proposed an amendment that would increase the age limit in respect to the officers of the Philippine Scouts and the Philippine Constabulary. I think the amendment was thought to be a proper one by several gentlemen on the Military Affairs Committee. They at least so expressed themselves to me, but thought that the time for its consideration was necessarily so short that they could not adopt it at that time. Even the chairman of the committee assured me that later the matter would receive consideration. I refer now to Mr. Hay, formerly chairman of that committee. I had already introduced a bill which provided for this very thing. The Committee on Military Affairs has been one of the hardest worked committees in this House ever since that time, and I am not criticizing them because they have not taken the matter up so far; but they are going to get this bill off their hands in a few days, and I sincerely trust that they will have a bearing or this receiving trust that they will have a hearing on the proposition, or at least give consideration to it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that there is no provision in any military law for the payment of the Philippine Constabulary and that their pay comes entirely from the Philippine government?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand that entirely; but that has nothing to do with my proposition, which is this, that we shall permit officers of the Philippine Scouts and the Philippine Constabulary, both of whom are citizens of the United States, to take examinations testing their proficiency to be appointed second lieutenants, and commissioned for that purappointed second inetraints, and commissioned for the passes of they pass the examination, notwithstanding they may be as old as 30 years.

Mr. DENT. Is 30 years the limit the gentleman stated?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think in my bill I had it 30

Mr. DENT. I think it is 30 years now as to scouts.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But not as to the constabulary. It may be it would have to be raised more than that. Let me say one thing with respect to the Philippine Constabulary. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Tague] has said, officers of the Philippine Scouts all came from the ranks of the Regular Army. That is not true of the officers of the Philippine Constabulary. They are nearly all young men who are graduates of American colleges and universities, who are recommended by the presidents of their respective institutions on account of their high character and general proficiency in military matters. They thereafter went through a system of in-struction and later on an examination, and if found especially proficient were commissioned officers in the Philippine Con-stabulary. The reason why I think both the Philippine Con-stabulary and the Philippine Scout officers should be permitted. to take this examination is this: We are after good men, and you will not find better men anywhere under the stars. These Philippine Scouts and Philippine Constabulary officers have been baptized in the fire of battle. They have had the command of men in the field and they have met the enemy. They have been tested, and those that are there now have not been found wanting

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the second proviso of section 37 of the act of June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," be amended as follows: Provided, That any person carried as qualified and registered in the grade of colonel or lieutenant colonel pursuant to the provisions of said act, on June 3, 1916, or any person holding a commission as a colonel or lieutenant colonel in the National Guard of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, on said date, who has served satisfactorily as such in the service of the United States under the call of May 8, 1916, or that of June 18, 1916, may be commissioned or recommissioned in the Officers' Reserve Corps with the rank for which he has been found qualified or registered or which he held in the National Guard on June 3, 1916, or while in the service of the United States, but when such person shall become thereafter separated from the Officers' Reserve Corps for any reason, the vacancy so caused shall not be filled and such office shall cease and terminate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as an additional paragraph, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read.

Mr. TILSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut desire recognition?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, there are certain inadvertent errors in regard to dates in this amendment as stated. I have had prepared an amendment which corrects those inadvertent errors in the nature of a substitute for the paragraph as it stands

Mr. DENT. I would suggest the gentleman offer it as a substitute.

Mr. TILSON. There were certain inadvertent errors in dates, and this corrects those errors.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it in lieu of the entire paragraph?
Mr. TILSON. Yes; in lieu of the entire proviso.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the language intended to take the place of the proviso.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 72, line 22, after the word "follows," strike out the remainder of the page and all of page 73 down to and including line 14 on that page, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That any person who, on June 3, 1916, was carried as qualified and registered in the grade of colonel or lieutenant colonel pursuant to the provisions of the act of January 21, 1903, or any person holding a commission as colonel or lieutenant colonel in the National Guard of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia on June 3, 1916, who has served satisfactorily as such in the service of the United States under the call of May 9, 1916, or that of June 18, 1916, may be commissioned or recommissioned in the Officers' Reserve Corps with rank for which he had been found qualified and registered, or which he held in the National Guard on June 3, 1916, or while in the service of the United States; but when such person shall become thereafter separated from the Officers' Reserve Corps for any reason, the vacancy so caused shall not be filled and such office shall cease and determine:

the vacancy so caused shall not be filled and such omce shall cease and determine:

"Provided further, That any officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps called for service with his consent in a lower grade than that held by him in said Reserve Corps shall, subject to such physical examination as may be prescribed, be considered eligible for recommission in such lower grade."

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Connecticut is to strike out the language of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the matter read at the Clerk's desk

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, so far as the chairman of the committee is able, I accept the substitute offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 73, line 14, after the word "terminate," insert: "Provided further, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the name of Capt. E. R. Warner McCabe, Eighth Cavairy, United States Army, to appear upon the lineal list of the captains of the Cavairy next below that of W. S. Martin, and upon the corresponding position on the relative list."

Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to state to the committee that Capt. McCabe was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Infantry on September 1, 1900, and transferred from that branch of the service to the Cavalry with the same rank on June 21, 1901. In addition to that a brother officer with a commission subsequent to his was transferred in a week or two with the same rank, and he antedates Capt. McCabe about 58 numbers. More than that, a number of officers were transferred subsequent to Capt. McCabe, having received no service whatever until after his transfer and who likewise take rank and precedence of Capt. McCabe in the files. I submit to the committee that this is an arbitrary and unjustifiable assignment, and I make this motion here in order to correct this in-

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hate to make the point of order, but of course this would open up a great many other injustices, and I will have to insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield as graciously as such injustice with admit of.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, before entirely leaving the subject of the Officers' Reserve Corps I wish to make a very brief statement. I said a moment ago, inadvertently, that the language I had inserted by way of a substitute was substantially the same as that in the bill, only changing some dates. I should have stated that at the end of the amendment that I offered was this proviso:

Provided further, That any officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps called for service with his consent in a lower grade than that held by him in said Reserve Corps shall, subject to such physical examination as may be prescribed, be considered eligible for recommission in such lower grade.

That was added to the provision already in the bill. I wish to be fair to the committee and not mislead anyone.

Mr. DENT. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Connecticut shall write that provision in the bill.

Mr. TILSON. I was sure that the gentleman would not object. The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the enlisted men who were discharged from the Army to accept a commission in the National Guard, at the call of the President, June 18, 1916, be restored to their original status upon reenlisting in the Regular Army: Provided, That they reenlist within three months from date of muster out of the United States service, and that in computing service for retirement and continuous service pay, service as an officer in the National Guard while in the service of the United States be counted.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 73, line 22, after the word "Guard," insert the words "or in any volunteer force that may be authorized in the future."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment to the same effect, on the next page.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 74, line 3, after the word "Guard," sert "or in any volunteer force that may be authorized in the future."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Kahn: Insert, after the word "counted," page 74, line 4, the following:

"Provided further, That hereafter any enlisted man of the Army who shall be discharged to enable him to accept a commission in the Officers' Reserve Corps, or in any National Guard or militia organization, or in any volunteer force that may be authorized in the future, and who shall enlist in the Army within three months after the termination of his connection as an officer with that corps, or with any organization of the National Guard or militia, or a volunteer force, or during the continuation of his connection therewith as an officer, shall, in computing continuous-service pay now authorized by law, be entitled to credit for the period of time actually served by him prior to said discharge; and in computing service for retirement and continuous-service pay service as an officer of the National Guard, while in the service of the United States, service in any volunteer force, and service in the Officers' Reserve* Corps in active service shall be counted."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Kahn].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the Navasota Transfer Co. be, and is hereby, relieved from further performance of its several contracts with the Government for the supply of hay and bedding at various posts and places in the Southern Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, in view of the changed conditions resulting from the call into the Federal service of the Organized Militia and the National Guard of the several States, such conditions having resulted in greatly enhancing the price of the supplies and in making the performance of the contract inequitable and a matter of exceptional hardship on the contractor; and said contracts shall be regarded as closed, final settlement being made with the contractor at the contract price for the supplies already delivered under the same.

Mr. MILLER of Delawaya. Mr. Chairman, I. make, a point

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman from Delaware reserve the point of order?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I reserve it.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Delaware reserve the point of order?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I will be glad to reserve it.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I must agree with the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Miller] and with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland] that the point of order under the standing rules of the House should lie if pressed against this paragraph. I think, however, that if the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Delaware understand accurately the facts that induced the department to recommend and the committee to insert this provision in the bill, then, being actuated as they are with a due regard to equity and fairness, they will not press the point. It is in the hope, therefore, that they may agree with the generalization I have just uttered, that induces me to tender this explanation of why the committee saw fit to embody this provision in the bill.

It so happens that the Navasota Transfer Co. is located in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent here, which must be my excuse for asking the gentlemen to withhold for a moment their point of order and for expressing the very sincere hope that they may not press the point.

It so happens that in about the month of March or April last year, 1916, the War Department asked for bids for the supplying of hay for feed and bedding for the horses used by the Army then upon the border, which was a portion of the Regular Army stationed at Fort Sam Houston, at San Antonio, and other places along the border, but a relatively small portion even of the standing Army; certainly not one in ten of the There soldiers that since then have been sent to the border. are two young men doing a delivery business in the town of Navasota, one by the name of Evans and another whose name has escaped me. I suppose their total wealth does not exceed $10,000. They have some horses, and they knew about cutting, baling, and selling hay. They answered that advertisement, and their bid was accepted in May, 1916.

The War Department entered into five several contracts with them, under the terms of which they were to receive $10.20 per ton for the quantity of hay provided for in the contracts. There were arbitrary provisions in the five contracts for the decrease or increase of the amount contemplated to be supplied under the contracts. It is true. They made those contracts, and they performed the contracts until mobilization.

I might add that there are two other gentlemen residing in Navasota, one named Brosig and the other Templeton. These gentlemen became sureties on these five contracts. know them personally, and I know they tell the truth, and I assure the House that they were not to receive one penny of profit, but purely as an act to help these two young men whom I have mentioned, doing business under the firm name and style of the Navasota Transfer Co., they became sureties on their contracts.

Immediately after those contracts were made, the mobilization of the National Guard upon the border was ordered by the President and 150,000 men, perhaps, with horses to consume prairie hay accordingly, were mobilized upon the border, and an amount of hay was called for immediately which they found it totally impossible to supply, although they exhausted every resource to increase the supply, which under normal conditions was sufficient when the contracts were entered into only two months before.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas

has expired.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five min-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. EAGLE. I thank you, gentlemen, very sincerely. Immediately thereupon the War Department itself went into the same open market and became a competitive bidder against these young men for the hay standing upon the prairies of Texas which was available to be cut and furnished under those contracts perhaps 50 times as much hay as was contemplated, but which was required for the vastly increased number of horses and stock, as well as for bedding and other purposes, in consequence of this mobilization order. The result was and is that hay costs now $20 per ton, whereas the contract price of these young gentlemen, agreed upon by the deliberate act of the War Department and themselves, was $10.20 a ton.

Now, another hardship imposed upon them thereby is that the sums of money which they fairly earned under the $10.20 contract are withheld from them in order to pay back the losses they are currently sustaining because the Government is paying $20 a ton for the deficit which they are unable to supply. Moreover, there is in Texas now a rainy season, and it costs a great deal of money to provide the roofing to keep the hay from spoiling. It was not cut. It must be currently cut under the custom prevailing over that State.

The consequence is that unintentionally you have wrecked the two young men who went into those contracts, and you will wreck and bankrupt two other men who went on the contracts of these young men as sureties without hope of reward; and I submit that a Government representing a hundred millions of people, with property perhaps amounting to $250,000,000,000 of value ought not to be arbitrarily oppressive upon two young men who sought faithfully to perform their contracts with the Government, which has, by its own act of competitive bidding, doubled the price of the commodity that was agreed to be furnished under the contracts. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY, Mr. Chairman, I want to add one word to what has been said by my colleague, Mr. Eagle. I began almost as a boy to practice law at Navasota. I do not know this Mr. Brosig, but I knew his father well, and I know Ward Templeton personally very well. Those men are men of a broad and generous and liberal spirit, just the men to go on the bond of young men struggling to get into some progressive business, without a dollar of reward to themselves.

When these two young men came to Brosig and Ward Templeton they did not come with a hand holding anything in it for Templeton and Brosig. They asked for a kindness and they got it. Now, these two men whose fortunes are at stake under the conditions stated by my colleague were not expecting or desiring one single, solitary dollar. Knowing them as I do, I do not believe that the great Government of the United States, even if they were less worthy, would wish to oppress them, and it is nothing less than oppression under the conditions truly stated by my colleague. I do hope there will be no pressing of the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it is necessary to withhold the point of order longer in this debate. These particular contractors are extremely fortunate in having two very able Members of this House to plead their cause in a very delightful and touching way, but in other respects they are in no different situation from that of scores of other contractors who have agreed to furnish supplies, such as paper and other supplies, to the Government, where the prices of those supplies have gone up.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. EAGLE. I respectfully submit to my friend that the statement he last made is, of course, unintentional, but, nevertheless inaccurate, and that Gen. Crozier and Secretary Baker have each, upon full knowledge and information, communicated in writing to this committee and stated that this was a peculiar and especial exception and that the equities of the situation justified them for the one and only time in asking this committee to do

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is entirely wrong about it.

Mr. EAGLE. Am I?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. A great many of these contractors have peculiar equities in their favor, and if I had the time and the House had the time to devote to that subject I could give you some very strong and appealing cases where contractors have found themselves in great difficulties and want to be relieved of their contracts. But these young men, I say, are fortunate la having their cause pleaded by gentlemen so able. But the question involves the rights of a great many other contractors who are being held literally to their contracts, and we ought not to play any favorites in this particular case.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield? I agree with the gentleman that no favorites ought to be played; but if a case is made out, and if the gentleman is convinced of the equity of it, does he not think he ought to let it stay in the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. My own opinion of the equity of it is not what will sway my judgment.

Mr. GARNER. It ought to have something to do with the gentleman's judgment.

Mr. BORLAND. We are here to enforce the law.

Mr. HOWARD. Is it not a fact that the War Department themselves came here and asked for a deficiency appropriation of over a million and a half of dollars, on the ground that the stuff they were buying for the Army had increased so much in price that they could not get along with the appropriation that had been made?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is exactly true, Mr. HOWARD. What is fair for the goose ought to be fair for the gander, ought it not?

Mr. BORLAND. Not a bit of it. If the price of hay had gone down to $5 a ton these gentlemen would have cleaned up a fortune. It went up to $20 a ton and they lost one. It is a plain business proposition and a risk that every Government contractor takes. They would not have given the Government a single, solitary cent if hay had gone down.

Mr. FIELDS. But the War Department itself caused the price of hay to go up by becoming a competitive bidder against these men. It went into their territory and went to bidding higher prices than they could pay. These men have already wrecked themselves. They do not ask that any money be refunded to them. They are already broke. They do not ask the Government to reimburse them for the money they have They only ask to be relieved from the contract, and I hope in the interest of common justice that the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. GARNER. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that a similar case has been passed on by this Con-That is to say, the Post Office Department have come gress. here asking for an additional appropriation of about half a million dollars in order to release contractors of the Post Office Department on account of increases in price which the Government was not responsible for. In this instance the Government is directly responsible for the increased price.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I am going to withdraw the point of order. The reason I made it was that a number of cases exactly similar to this have come up before the Committee on Claims, some have been acted upon, others have not. It is clearly a claims matter. But in view of the explanation made by the several gentlemen from Texas, I see ample reason why we should permit this to go through at this time, and I will not take any more time to discuss it. Therefore I withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland] makes the point of order and the Chair sustains it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That, during the fiscal year 1918, all civilian clerks employed under the War Department, including on the lump-sum rolls only those persons who are carried thereon at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, shall receive increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate per annum of less than $1,200, and increased compensation at a rate of 5 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate of not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum and provided further, That so much as may be necessary is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, in order to perfect the language of this section I move to amend, on page 74, line 21, by striking out the word "clerks" and insert the word "employees." I also move to strike out the word "under," in line 21, and insert the word "in."

Mr. MANN. You want to strike out the word "employed" in the same line.

Mr. DENT. Yes; and I move to strike out the word "employed" also. Also, in line 22, I move to strike out the words "War Department" and substitute the words "Military Establishment." Then, in line 7, on page 75, after the word "necessary," I move to insert the words "for this purpose."

Mr. MANN. That does not quite complete it.

Mr. KAHN. In line 2, page 75, the word "from" should be changed to the word "in," and the word "department" should be changed to "establishment."

Mr. DENT. I agree to that.
Mr. KAHN. And also in line 5, page 75, the word "from" should be changed to "in," and the word "department" should be changed to "establishment."

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman offer those amendments?

Mr. DENT. I offer those amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report all the amendments. Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to strike out the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof this paragraph with the amendments, so that we will have only one amendment.

Mr. DENT. I will do that, Mr. Chairman. I move to strike out the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the paragraph as amended as suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the paragraph and to insert in lieu thereof a new paragraph which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk rend as follows:

The Clerk rend as follows:

Page 74, strike out the paragraph beginning in line 20 and ending with line 9, on page 75, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided further, That, during the fiscal year 1918, all civilian employees in the Military Establishment, including on the lump-sum rolls only those persons who are carried thereon at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, shall receive increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages in such establishment at a rate per annum of less than $1,200, and increased compensation at a rate of 5 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages in such establishment at a rate of not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum: And provided further, That so much as may be necessary for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Caldwell: Page 75, line 9, after the word "appropriated," insert:

"Provided further, That hereafter every male person (a) who is a citizen of the United States or (b) who has made a declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States shall, except as provided herein, undergo military or naval training as prescribed by the President for a period of six months during the calendar year in which he reaches the age of 19 years, or, if not then within the description of either (a) or (b) of this section, in the calendar year in which he first comes within such description or in the year immediately following. No person shall be subject to such training after the year in which he attains the age of 26 years, except as otherwise provided in section 2, nor for more than one period of such training.

"Sec. 2. Continued liability to train: That if any person liable to training does not train in any year in which he is subject thereto, he shall, in addition to the penalties prescribed by law, undergo training in the next succeeding year up to the calendar year in which he reaches the age of 26 years, and avoiding training in any year shall constitute a separate offense.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, that is the amendment which has already been printed on page 3871 of the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered as offered without being read, and I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order?

Mr. DENT. I will reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read, it having been printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, is this what is known as the compulsory military-training amendment?

Mr. CALDWELL. It is the same amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there has been quite a little discussion informally upon this amendment. It was read into the RECORD for the consideration of the Members of this House, and those of you who have read it understand that it is practically the Chamberlain universal military training bill. To my mind it is necessary for us at this time to do something radical toward the preparation of this country in the event of trouble. Every newspaper practically in the United States is pointing out to the Members of this Congress that we are rapidly coming to a day when the United States will be forced to take up arms in defense of its rights. In their opinion, war is imminent. In other minds, a different opinion prevails; a great many think war is not imminent. As for myself, I do not believe it is as imminent as the newspapers and some of the calamity howlers seem to think it is, but I do feel that the possibilities of trouble are sufficient to warrant us, at this time, in taking some radical step toward putting this country in a position to defend itself in the event of such a catastrophe.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.
Mr. KEATING. Has anyone, other than the newspapers, been declaring that the country was on the point of war?
Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; and I have heard many private citizens state so in casual conversation. I frankly say that I do not believe that the country is on the point of war, myself; but I do say that it is wisdom for Congress to put the country in a position where, if trouble does occur, it can not be said that the danger was called to our attention and we sat quietly by and did nothing about it.

Gentlemen, in addition to that I understand that the War College has just about perfected a bill calling for universal training, and I understand also that that bill is about to be sent to this Congress with the request that action be taken on it. If we undertake that, it can not be done between now and the 4th of March, and it will mean a special session of Congress to permit the calling of witnesses and conduct extensive hearings as to the facts. Now, this amendment has been prepared and covers the situation under the present conditions.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Is the gentleman talking about compulsory military service.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. And he says that the War College has drawn a bill like this which it expects to be passed by this Congress?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. Mr. HOWARD. They do?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. Mr. HOWARD. Well, the gentlemen in the War College are the most credulous beings that I have heard spoken of on the floor of this House.

[Laughter.]
The War College has been asked to pre-Mr. CALDWELL. pare such a bill upon the assumption that this Congress will pass it and carry out what some of us believe to be the will of the people.

I do not favor a system of military training or service that would destroy the individuality of the American, nor would I favor fastening upon our institution of government a military establishment that could be used to surpass civil authority. The amendment I offer does neither, nor will it permit the use of the armed force by it created in labor disputes. It provides, on the other hand, the nucleus of a real armed force of ultimately about 3,000,000 men and will educate and develop American youth to the end that they will become physically fit and mentally equipped to make better men. I hope that the point of order will be withdrawn in order that a vote may be had upon the proposition. The country would then know how much support real preparedness has in this Congress

Mr. FIELDS. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, line 9, after the word "Appropriate," insert the fol-

Page 75, line 9, after the word "Appropriate," insert the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, and all the property, rights of property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto, and he is further authorized, if in his judgment the price is reasonable and satisfactory, to make a contract for the purchase of the same subject to future ratification and appropriation by the Congress.

In the event of the inability of the Secretary of War to make a satisfactory contract for the voluntary purchase of said canal and its appurtenances, he is hereby authorized and directed through the Attorney General to institute and carry to completion proceedings for the condemnation of said canal and its appurtenances, the acceptance of the award in said proceedings to be subject to the future ratification and appropriation by Congress. Such condemnation proceedings shall be instituted and conducted in, and jurisdiction of said proceedings is hereby given to the District Court of the United States for the District of Delaware substantially as provided in "An act to authorize condemnation of land for sites for public buildings and for other purposes," approved August 1, 1888, and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the necessary costs thereof and expenses in connection therewith."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. DENT. I will reserve it for a minute and a half.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the House is tired and I want to expedite the passage of this bill, but I would be unfaithful to the people living along the Atlantic seaboard if I did not attempt to have this matter considered at this time. It will probably be the last opportunity during this session of Congress that the matter can be considered at all. If an emergency should arise following the adjournment of Congress, and the President and the War and Navy Departments should need this passageway for vessels of war, and this old waterway should remain inadequate, a Kiel Canal would be lost to the Government of the United States. That is all I have to say.

Mr. DENT. I make the point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept, as trustee, for the use and benefit of the United States Government, so far as it may desire to utilize the same for its purposes, assignment from the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian of the use of said discovery, except as hereinafter specified: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall also be authorized to accept, as trustee, for the use and benefit of the United States Government, so far as it may desire to utilize the same for its purposes, the assignment of the use of any device, improve-same for its purposes, the assignment of the use of any device, improvement, process, equipment, apparatus, or other matter or thing developed or acquired by Garabed T. K. Giragossian, his successors, representatives, or assigns, in the use of said discovered means.

That the Secretary of War is authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations and enter into such contracts as may be necessary to carry this resolution into effect: Provided, however, That the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian shall demonstrate the entire practicability of his discovery before a commission of five eminent scientists to be appointed by the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian, to be approved by the Secretary of War, and if such demonstration shall prove successful in the opinion of said scientists and the said Secretary of War the United States shall recognize the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian as the only original inventor, discoverer, and legal owner of said discovered "Garabed" and any improvements that may be made therein or thereon, and will not issue any patent for any device, improvement, process, equipment, apparatus, or other matter or thing developed in the use of said "Garabed" or based upon the system or correlative principle of said "Garabed" and will protect the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian's rights and interests thereto for a period of 17 years, as well as of his representatives and assigns, in the United States and in foreign countries where such protection is afforded by treaty obligation, international law, and diplomatic representations, and as is further set forth in Senate joint resolution 172, introduced in the Senate by Senator Chamberlain on September 1 (calendar day, Sept. 4), 1916.

That owing to the pressing need for the manufacture of mirrates, which by present processes will involve the expenditure of many millions of dollars, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to immediately accept the offer of Mr. Garabed T. K. Giragossian to demonstrate his "Garabed," since he claims that Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts may be considered as read, and I make the point of order.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] will not object. This is very interesting, because it is a proposition that we all desire to know something about. [Laughter and cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I realize as much as any Member of the House does that it is going to be considered as a joke [cries of "Regular order!"], but I want to say—

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The gen-

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the matter indicated shall be considered as read and printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objec-

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the title of the bill be amended by striking out the period after the word "eighteen" and inserting the words "and for other purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title by striking out the period after "eighteen" and inserting "and for other purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20783, the Army appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Dent amendment striking out the stop-watch provision in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado demands a separate vote on the Dent amendment respecting the stopwatch provision. Is a separate vote demanded on any other? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put the question on the rest of the amendments en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments except the Dent amendment, so called.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Dent amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 66, by striking out the proviso beginning with line 11 and ending with line 23, as follows:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

The SPEAKER. The guestion is on the Department

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Dent amendment.

The question was taken and Mr. Gordon demanded a division. The SPEAKER. Those in favor of the Dent amendment will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. CANNON (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. What vote retains this amendment, the "aye" or the "no"?

The SPEAKER. The amendment that is being voted on is called the Dent amendment and it is to strike out the Taylor

Mr. KEATING. Oh, no; it is the restriction on the Taylor estem. If the Speaker will bear with me, those who believe in abolishing the stop-watch system in Government workshops will vote "no," and those who are opposed to abolishing the stop-watch system will vote "aye."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, may I add to that this, that those who are in favor of having the RECORD show that the Committee on Military Affairs struck this thing out will vote "aye," and those who are not in favor of the Record being fairly stated will vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it himself. Those in favor of the Taylor system will vote "no." The vote is on what is called the Dent amendment, and that means to strike out the restriction upon the Taylor system. If you are in favor of striking out the restriction on the Taylor system. If you are in favor of striking out the restriction on the Taylor system vote "aye," and if you are not, vote "no." Those who desire to vote "aye" will stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and six have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and fourteen have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 106 and the noes are 114.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twentyfive Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and navs are refused.

So the Dent amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Dent, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bills 20496 and 20827, to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bills the titles of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20496) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

A bill (H. R. 20827) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table, under the rules, the conference reports on House bills 18181, 19937, and 20451.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks to take from the Speaker's table, under the rules, the conference reports on the bills, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18181) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

A bill (H. R. 19937) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

A bill (H. R. 20451) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SDEAKER (Delegad resisted wholen the rule)

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20967, the sundry civil bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to renew my request of a moment ago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will withhold the motion.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The gentleman from Oklahoma would like to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks to take from the Speaker's table the bills H. R. 20496 and H. R. 20827, to disagree to all Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20967, and pending that I would ask the gentleman from Massawe can agreed upon general debate.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have had requests for a little over an hour and an hour will satisfy the demand on this side. I have had more requests, but I find at this hour some of the requests will not be used.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate extend until the committee rises to-night, when it shall be closed.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the general debate run until the committee rises to-night. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is it the intention of the gentleman to transact any other business than general debate before adjournment to-night?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should think that would be sufficiently important to engross the Members for the rest of the evening.

Mr. KITCHIN. There will be no other business. The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. Almon, Mr. Langley, and Mr. Steele of Iowa were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask leave of absence for my colleague Mr. Kearns, who is confined to his room on account of sickness. He asked me to state to the House if he had been-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cooper] asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague Mr. KEARNS.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. And he also asked me to state to the House that if he had been here yesterday he would have voted for the Reed amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for leave of absence for his colleague from Ohio [Mr. Kearns] on account of sickness. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and myself, to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to control one half of the time in general debate and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gillett] the other half. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on the Post Office bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Where requests to extend remarks in the Record are granted pending a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House, where will they appear in the permanent RECORD? Inserted after the motion is made and before it was put, it not being a debatable motion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Do not look at me.
The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. The Chair thinks it is bad practice to let it in in that way and will shut it off hereafter.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice if anybody desires to rise in general debate that they kindly do so to-night, as I intend to move to close it before we go into committee to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20967, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, with Mr. Ganner in the chair. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20967) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing easier, and I suppose there is nothing in a general way that is more popular, than to criticize Government expenditures in the abstract and to level shafts

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman proceeding now under general debate?

Mr. BORLAND. I understand so. Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, or, through him, the chairman of the committee, whether it is intended to read the bill to-night?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I understand not.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it the intention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to proceed to read the bill to-night?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman frankly that if he intends to begin to read the bill I will make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We do not intend to. There are some gentlemen who wish to speak.

leave the Hall.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the bill will not be read to-night. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some gentlemen desire to Mr. FITZGERALD. I only expect to read the first para-

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All right; I have no objection. Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing easier and, possibly, nothing that will gain cheaper applause than a general and sweeping attack upon the expenditures of the Federal Government. The less information the critic has the more enthusiastic it is possible for him to make the attack. No problem is so simple as when one first approaches it. It seems to be extremely easy to denounce expenditures in the abstract, but to point out specific economies and to vote for those specific economies does not always seem to be quite so easy.

We are treated every little while to a general discussion of the increases in the expenses of the Government, and between times we are treated to a general, concerted, collective, and combined attack upon the Federal Treasury to get appropriations, sometimes under one pretext and sometimes under an-Sometimes it is on the question of the high cost of living, and the demand is for some kind of a salary increase; sometimes a Government contractor who figured on making a great deal of money finds he is on the point of losing some money, and, therefore, he or his bondsman ought to be relieved; sometimes some gratuity or some other reward ought to be paid out to some individual or class of individuals. There is always an opportunity to advocate, with a great deal of applause, specific expenditures and at the same time to denounce the gross expenditures of the Government. It is needless for to say that that kind of conduct is inconsistent; that it simply results in demoralizing public opinion and leads no-

The truth about the matter is this: The Federal Government must look for its supplies to the taxation of the American people. It ought to limit its expenses to a sum that can be demonstrated to be absolutely indispensable for the purpose of honest, efficient, and economical government. I am sometimes surprised when I hear gentlemen get up and say, "Oh, well, the great Government of the United States ought not to stick at such a small amount as this." The truth is that whoever undertakes to draw a dollar out of the Federal Treasury ought to have the entire burden of proof on him to prove beyond the shadow of a doubt, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he is entitled to the money. Instead of resolving the doubt in favor of the claimant, every doubt ought to be resolved against the claimant; and yet that is not the custom of this House.

I want to say this in regard to the increase in Government expenditures, that with a growing Nation such as ours, with a constantly increasing population, the Government expenditures are bound to increase from purely natural causes. It costs more to govern 100,000,000 people than it costs to govern 75,000,000 people, and it costs more to govern 75,000,000 people than it does to govern 12,000,000. If there were no other elements involved, there would be a biennial increase in the gross expenditures of the Federal Government.

But there is another element involved which is equally important, and that is our growing idea of the activities that the Government ought to assume. Every time we provide for a particular set of activities, those activities entail not only an initial but a continuing expense on the Federal Treasury. They may be activities that are very useful to the people, perhaps necessary, important, and even indispensable; but they entail a continuing expense to the Federal Government.

Every bill that is reported carries, for instance, provisions for enlargement of or aids to navigation, lighthouses, buoys, and other such things, involves continuous cost to the Federal Government. This is simply a general illustration of a class of expenses that are continually growing.

But there is another reason which adds to the growing weight of general expenditures, and that is the class of new activities of the Federal Government that are devised by the Congress at the behest of the people. Here comes a proposition for the physical valuation of railroads, a very highly desirable thing, and yet it costs a great deal of money. Three and a half million dollars, if I recollect aright, is appropriated by this bill to carry on that work. In all, no doubt, $15,000,000 will be appropriated for the physical valuation of railroads.

Then we have the creation of these new boards-the Shipping Board, the Farm Loan Board, the Federal Trade Commission, the Commission of Conciliation of Labor Disputes, and so on. Every one of these new activities of the Federal Government must be provided with a force of employees, housing, stationery, and so on.

We could deny to the people the creation of these activities; but if we create them we have not only added to the necessary expenses occasioned by the growth of the Government that we have had, but we add another element to the growing expenses of the Government. I believe the facts will bear me out when I say that, except for the extraordinary expenses caused by the program of national defense, we will find by this bill that the Federal Government is being conducted more cheaply and better for the money than ever before in the history of the American people.

Instead of this bill being any reflection upon the Democratic majority or the Democratic administration, I think the true facts will show that we are doing more work for less money, and doing it better, than ever before in the history of the the misleading element in the situation is the large amount for national defense, and yet I can not allow our critics, especially our partisan critics, to add that amount to the burdens of the Democratic administration. Why, when President Cleveland went out of office, if I am not mistaken, we occupied the proud position of having the second Navy in the world. We did not need at that time more than a second navy, because nobody thought of rivaling the policy of Great Britain, which was to double the naval power of any other nation, but we had the second Navy in the world. When President Wilson came into office we were told we had sunk at least to the fourth place, and possibly the fifth, and that we were unable to guard our coast from the Navy of Japan. We had been expending a large amount of money in those intervening years on the Navy. Certainly that should not be charged to the Democratic administration. To whatever else it could be charged, whether it could be charged to the lethargy of the American public or the negligence of the party in power or to the fact that the American people had not awakened to a true realization of its military condition, you surely could not charge it to any negligence upon the part of the Democratic administration.

Mr. COLEMAN, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COLEMAN. Does the gentleman believe that the Navy was fifth in power when President Wilson came into office?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not enough of an expert on such matters to know, but I do not think that in all lines ours was fifth in rank. That impression is arrived at by assembling the ships of a certific clear William in the state of a certific clear will be a second or the certific clear will be a ships of a certain class. While we were better than fifth, and better than fourth, and, possibly, better than third along some lines, we certainly as a whole were not up to second in fighting strength, as the second navy in the world. That is a matter I am not qualified to pass upon, but we were so told by men who claimed to be naval experts and who assumed to speak from definite knowledge.

The same is true as to our Army. We have had the most expensive Army in the world since the Spanish-American War occurred, but we woke up to find out our Army was not sufficient to police even the Mexican border, the shortest border we have.

Now, the fact that we find it necessary, under pressure of public opinion, perhaps, if you choose to put it that way, to increase both our military and naval branches of defense shows it to be an extraordinary expense which, in fairness, should have been distributed back over 16 years, but we are massing it in about four or five years. It is necessary for men who criticize public expenditures to be fair. I think in this Congress I have attacked specifically, definitely, and concretely more subjects of governmental expenditure than any other one man on the floor. I have attacked concrete extravagances that I believed could be dispensed with. But I do not believe in making criticisms of expenses which have been too long delayed already.

Now, let us see what can be done about the situation. we to leave out the element of national defense? opinion says no. Are we to stop increasing the activities of the Government along lines in which they might be useful to the people? We are even asked to do more in that direction than we are now doing. What we can do and what we have done in this bill is to do the work more efficiently and more economically for the money extracted from the American people. I think—and, indeed, I believe I know—that we have not reached any real point of efficiency even along that line. realize that there is continual duplication of work in the different departments.

That grows out of the very natural desire on the part of the head of each department, if he be a man of ambition and enterprise, to increase and enlarge the activities of his department. It is almost impossible to keep these departments from absorbing and usurping functions that belong to other departments. They want to do that because they feel that they can extend the powers of the Government, and possibly increase their own prestige and importance. For instance, here is the Bureau of Education laying out a large plan of general education for the American people, and we find that the Bureau of Naturalization is trying also to install and erect an educational system particularly adapted to immigrants-a pure duplication of powers. No doubt the scientific activities of the Government are greatly duplicated between the Geological Survey and the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Bureau of Mines and the Bureau of Stand-

There are a great many ways in which the overlapping work should be cut off, and I am not sure but that a distinguished Member of another body was right when he said at least $30,-000,000 could be saved annually by giving the President authority to combine and consolidate bureaus and departments in the Federal Government and to rearrange the work between them. This much, however, has occurred to me as a practical proposition: I have not been able to formulate definitely my ideas upon the subject of a national budget, but I do believe that if this Government is to live by a direct tax, such as an income tax or a tax upon profits of business, or any other form of direct taxation, it will be necessary for us to adopt some form of a budget system. In other words, it will be necessary for the administration in power to make out a list of the expenditures it expects the people to support, how much is to be devoted to particular purposes, and then balance the sheet by showing on the other side how it expects to raise that money, by what form of taxation, so that the people will have an opportunity in some fair, open way to choose between taxing themselves for an activity or going without the activity itself. Under our present system that clear choice does not exist. The people seem to have an idea that they can get an activity if they can bring a sufficient pressure on Congress to secure it, but when it comes to paying the taxes they do not connect the taxes with the activity which they have demanded at the hands of Congress

Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BORLAND, I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that Congress hardly ever appropriates as much money as the various departments recommend and estimate?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did the impression get abroad, then, which is almost universal, that Congress is the extravagant body of the Government, instead of the administration being the extravagant body?

Mr. BORLAND. That is the falsest impression that ever got into the public mind. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course it is. Mr. BORLAND. There never has been a time, so far as I know, when Congress has not pared down the estimates of the executive departments, and I think it is the duty of the executive departments to be just as careful and to be just as rigid in their economy and efficiency as it is the duty of Congress. do not think that the whole responsibility ought to rest upon Congress or a few committees of Congress, as it does now.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield for a

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma. Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Is it a fact that the departments get into the habit of asking for more than they expect to get, simply because it has been the custom of Congress to appropriate less than the departments ask for?

Mr. BORLAND. Some say that is true; but that is not always an explanation of their increased estimates, because many of their increased estimates are for things that nobody has asked them to undertake.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not the departments for several years exceed the appropriations of Congress to such an extent that we finally had to pass a law making it a criminal offense for them to do it?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is exactly what occurred. It has not happened under the recent administration, but it has occurred.

Mr. MANN. How much is the general deficiency bill going to amount to this year?

Mr. BORLAND. The deficiency bill this year will be very much expanded by the $25,000,000 that we are going to pay for the Danish West Indies.

Mr. MANN. The general deficiency bill will amount to $100,000,000 or more, the largest we have ever had in the history of the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Thirty million dollars of it has been on account of the Mexican situation.

Mr. BORLAND. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations suggests that $30,000,000 of that is accounted for by the Mexican situation.

Mr. MANN. It is always accounted for.

Mr. BORLAND. It is accounted for, in this way, that it is an unforeseen expense, an expense that the executive department could not have estimated for. But I see the point of the gentleman. It does not excuse the executive departments, because in many cases they have conducted activities on a scale entirely out of proportion to the provision that Congress made at the time, when, as a matter of fact, they should have kept their activities within the scope prescribed by the annual appropriation bills of Congress. It is just as much their duty to economize as it is the duty of Congress. But what I wanted to say is this: Since the Civil War this country has been largely under a system of indirect tariff taxation which did not disclose to the people the connection between the taxes they paid and the expenses of the Government. The public got the impression that money could be had out of the Federal Treasury as a Christmas gift, or in some way or other that money flowed into the Federal Treasury from the blue sky, or was paid in by the foreigners or somebody else.

The impression never was quite clear in their minds that the money was paid out of the pockets of the American people, and consequently they were educated by a class of statesmen in this country to the belief that the duty of a statesman was to get money out of the Federal Treasury for his constituents, and that that was the measure of his usefulness and popularity.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. What does the gentleman think the system of revenue that we about this: In case we pursue the system of revenue that we have under the present administration, whereby a large part of the revenue comes from a comparatively few individuals, will not that be as bad and perhaps worse than a system of indirect taxation, where the people do not feel it at all? Most people will not feel it under this system, will they?

Mr. BORLAND. The great difficulty I see is the one we have been pursuing in the past, a system of revenue by which the large mass of the people pay the freight and a few escape. If we succeed in getting it turned around and the few are paying a larger part for the support of the Government and the large mass of the people are escaping there may be some justification for the change. But the gentleman is not quite correct in saying that the virtue of direct taxation will be lost. One of the many vicious things of indirect taxation was that the people got the idea that the Federal Treasury could be drawn upon for all sorts of things without affecting their pocketbooks. One of the virtues of direct taxation is that the people see written in the tax bill what the Government is spending. Every man that studies economics knows that direct taxation is the manhood of the Nation, while indirect taxation is the childhood of the Nation. You can tax a nation indirectly when it is not got to the point of realizing what it is taxed for. In many nations of the world the people are taxed in that way. When I went into the Spanish-American countries I was struck with the fact that there was no taxation on lands. The taxation was on production and exports and a few monopolies. They said you could not tax the land without creating a rebellion. people would not submit to a direct tax on land.

I am not sure, as I am not familiar with the details, that we have yet been able to enforce in the Philippines a direct tax on They do not understand it. They are willing to submit to any kind of taxation, even a lottery scheme if it is an indirect taxation, no matter how much it degrades the people. Every man ought to have his share of interest in the Federal Government, and he ought to know what it costs him and he ought to pay the money with his eyes wide open. When that condition comes about, when the income tax is the rule in this country, as it must be from now on, as it is in many first-class countries of the world, the people will begin to measure the activities of the Government by what they cost, and if they cost too much it will discourage the activities that are not worth the maintenance. I think that the people ought to have all of the activities of the Government that they want, but they ought to pay for them with their eyes wide open.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is saying. Is it not a fact that in the State governments, where they pay direct taxes on every piece of property, that nevertheless in the last 20 years the expenses of the State government has increased perhaps in a much larger ratio than those of the Federal Government, and that the taxes are directly on the people?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I am not sure that that is the case. I know that usually the high or low taxes is more often made an issue in the State campaign than in the national campaign.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Has not the State government largely increased in expenditures?

Mr. BORLAND. I know the further fact that the State legislators are always very chary about taking on new activities that are going to increase taxation, and that wherever there is an opportunity to shoulder off any State burdens onto the Federal Government they are very apt to do so. I have noticed in the last two years that it is customary in Western States for the candidates for governor to make a campaign on what Congress ought to do for the people. That has happened in several Western States, and I suppose it happens occasionally in Eastern States.

Before the American people can intelligently pass upon questions as to whether the Federal Government is or is not extravagant, they must know what the activities are that the Government is providing for them, and how much relatively these activities cost out of the total amount to be expended. Then these activities can be cut off by a wise administration, and the people will indorse the action, and the other activities can be accompanied by a tax for their support, and the people will indorse that. That is the British system. The British have an advantage in having their minister on the floor of the popular branch of the legislature, where he is subject to criticism and questioned for the information by any member, particularly the opposite party, and where he must explain the budget to the people.

But before the budget system can be fully effective in this country it might be necessary that we should have the same advantage, or the difficulty that the Speaker mentioned a while ago would still be with us, and that is that the estimates by the department largely exceed the possible revenues of the Government.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. There appears to be some criticism because the heads of the departments ask for more money than Congress allows. Is it not the fact that the heads of departments of municipal bodies and States do the same thing?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that the estimates are large because Congress is in the habit of cutting down the esti-

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; the complaint can be made that the Congress cuts down estimates, and accompanying that comes a very inconsistent charge that Congress is the one that is guilty of extravagance.

Before there will be any correction of the extravagance of the Federal Government there must be, in my judgment, not only an equal responsibility of the executive and legislative department for economy and efficiency but there must be such a clear-cut responsibility of the Members of the legislative body before their constituents that their constituents will realize and appreciate their efforts in obtaining economy and efficiency fully as clearly as their efforts in extravagance of expenditure.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. Mr. SIEGEL. Is it not a fact that the States are responsible in that they are running to Congress to get relief in all sorts of questions?

Mr. BORLAND. There is no question about that. I have discussed that subject before, not so much here as before lawyers, but that is a natural growth, and it is something that is hard for us to avoid, and something I am not sure we should avoid. There are certain contingencies that the Constitution did not provide for that did not exist at that time and could not be foreseen; but that can be met by uniformity of legislative action throughout the States. Wherever a subject grows to the proportion that it can not be handled separately by State action, the irrepressible demand rises in the country that the Federal Government take charge of it.

Mr. SIEGEL. Can not the same effect be obtained by each State passing uniform laws, as for instance in the negotiable-instrument law?

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman has followed that he will know that that was the only uniform law that was ever passed by all of the States. That was done through the influence of the American Bar Association. The American Bar Association got every State to agree to pass that law as drafted. Then they tried to get a uniform bill-of-lading law, and they fell down upon that.

Mr. SIEGEL. Is not this true, that if that can be done by concentrated action, then the same thing by agitation can be done in respect to other laws?

Mr. BORLAND. I think the method of securing uniform action in 48 States is clumsy. The method of the governors' conference has not led to any good result and the business people of the country instinctively turn to the power that has complete control, and that is Congress.

Mr. SIEGEL. Is it not a fact that Congress has so much legislation to attend to during the time that it is in session that it can not give attention to the most important questions, and handle them thoroughly and efficiently, on account of the numerous other measures that are constantly brought here by the people running from the States to Congress for relief?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think under modern conditions a country can ever grow so large or complex that one legislative body can not conduct general legislation for it. I think there are a great many departmental matters that we need not interfere with, but which we do interfere with. For instance, the Post Office appropriation bill came before the House not long since with a great many departmental regulations. It does not seem to me that there was the slightest use of Congress taking up any of its time upon those things. Yet we probably debated them for days and they excited interest, and Members had to take an interest and vote upon them—things in which the Members of this House have no possible concern and should not have been elected for the purpose of coming here to discuss. They were purely departmental matters. If we are going to hold out to our constituents that we can take care of every half dozen men everywhere who happen to be affected by a departmental order, we are going to have more work than we can do. No body of legislators can do that in such a complex Government as this. We must have an executive department that can inforce the regulations fairly, without interference by Congress.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am not going now to discuss this bill. I wish to call attention to the recent change that has been made in the daily statement of the United States You all remember that soon after this administration came in a change in the form of the daily Treasury state-The explanation was given out that the change was inaugurated in order that a form might be adopted which should be true and accurate and scientific and intelligible. I think myself it is very unfortunate ever to change the form unless it is absolutely necessary or is an unqualified improvement, because a great portion of the value of a statement is the comparison that you can make of one day and week and year with another. If you keep changing it, you absolutely destroy the possibility of that comparison. It is often said of the law that it does not make much difference what the law is so long as it always remains the same, so that everyone can know his rights, and the same reasoning applies to Treasury statements-they are as valuable for the comparison they allow between different dates as for the intrinsic information they After this first scientific statement had been prepared by the officials of the Treasury and adopted in daily use, you will remember it was not a great while before there was an-The daily receipts kept getting less than the daily expenditures and the Treasury balance kept perpetually dwindling. We went to bed the night of September 30, 1915, with a Treasury balance, which, according to the statement, had shrunk to some forty-odd million dollars, and woke up the next morning with a Treasury balance, according to the new form of statement, of one hundred and twenty-odd million dollars. Meanwhile the Treasury of the United States had been daily depleted by the excessive expenditures of the Democratic administration, and the suspicion, I think, was engendered that that was the main reason for this sudden change in the form of the daily statement.

But the Treasury Department told us that the change was made in order that the statement might be more intelligible and better appreciated by the people, and perhaps it was only partisan and skeptical persons who suspected that the change was made in order to cover up the low ebb to which the Treasury was reduced. That form of statement has been used since October 1, 1915, up until last Friday, February 16. you know, the great increase in the apparent balance over night was accomplished by counting as assets money which had been credited to disbursing officers in order to pay their debts, and also counting money held for the retirement of national bank notes. On February 15 the statement read like this:

Net balance, including $70,127,345.28 to credit of disbursing officers, $74,088,817.99.

On February 16 they suddenly took out the phrase "net balance, including the amount to the credit of disbursing officers," and simply said "net balance," and in a note at the bottom of the sheet stated what the amount to the credit of the disbursing officers was. I think we can see a reason for that, As the Treasury's balance is growing less and less every day, in a very few days the amount of the net balance will be less than the amount which stands to the credit of the disbursing officers, and it would look very awkward for the Treasury statement to say that the net balance, including, say, $70,000,000 to the credit of disbursing officers, was $60,000,000, for that would show upon its face a deficit of $10,000,000, and although really there is to-day a deficit in the Treasury of over $40,-000,000, yet under the present form of statement it does not show, and the Treasury saves its face, unless you read the note

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. BENNET. What would happen if the disbursing officers should all at once conclude to draw their balances?

Mr. GILLETT. The Treasury would be bankrupt. Mr. BENNET. In other words, the United States Government is in the shape to-night where it can not pay the disbursing officers' checks if they all happened to be drawn at once?

Mr. GILLETT. It can not pay the disbursing officers' checks, and also the amount which is allowed for the retirement of the national-bank notes, which is really a trust fund.

Mr. BENNET. Surely.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course, it could to-day pay the disbursing officers alone, using the trust funds for that purpose, and have a couple of million dollars to spare; but by the end of next week it probably could not do that.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. One not a skilled bookkeeper would think that the Treasury had a net balance of $70,000,000. Mr. GILLETT. Certainly; unless they read this note below, Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. They would be obliged to examine the note below to discover the real balance.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. That is not fair to the American people.

Mr. GILLETT. I am not surprised that you think so. Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The Treasurer neglected to deduct about $4,000,000 which were warrants he had given.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman refers to the warrants due when made?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It is not there; when a man gives a check the balance is not there, and that makes 4,000,000 more.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly. These changes in the form of the Treasury statement, made already three times under Mr. GILLETT. this administration, create an uneasy feeling that the ury of the United States is not being conducted in the high and open plane which we have a right to expect, that the bookkeeping is changed and accounts are juggled in order to hide and cover up facts which would tend to discredit the administration. There is another topic to which I wish to allude. This bill, like all the other appropriation bills, contains provision for an increase of salaries for the clerical force of the Government. I recognize the difficulty which everyone on a salary encounters in continuing their usual scale of living when the scale of prices of all kinds of necessities has so increased; but I regret that the majority of the House, instead of meeting the emergency by a temporary expedient, has not seized the occasion to effect the permanent changes which the departmental service so much needs.

Years ago I had occasion, as chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, to investigate the question, and I came to the conclusion, which I have held ever since, and which I have frequently announced, that one of the greatest needs of the Government service to-day was an entire reclassification of the Government employment, with a new grading of salaries, and in connection with it some kind of a retirement plan. Years ago we worked on the project and went so far as to report a measure to the House, but it is, of course, a difficult problem; one which requires an enormous study of detail, and the House was always too busy to take enough interest in it to seriously consider it.

And yet it is a subject of pressing importance. To-day in all the departments men and women are sitting side by side doing practically the same work and receiving very different compensation. There are cases where those who do the most difficult work and the greatest amount of it, receive less compensation than those with far easier tasks, and yet I fear until there is general legislation covering the whole subject these inequalities will continue.

Then there is the question of superannuation pressing upon us with constantly increasing force. It has stared us in the face for many years and has not been met. As far back as 1890 Congress enacted a provision that the different departments should report annually to Congress what clerks they employed who fell below a fair standard of efficiency, but I suspect the Cabinet officers have been very loath to give a full and accurate report of those cases. I looked over the Book of Estimates this year and found the number so reported was very few, although among them were reported some clerks who were still allowed to receive the highest grade of salary.

The Appropriations Committee found some years ago, by the admission of some of the Cabinet officers, that some of the departments were inaugurating what was practically a system departments were inaugurating what was practically a system of pensions, by keeping men who were practically useless but giving them very small salaries. Congress apparently felt that inasmuch as there was no pension law, the heads of departments had no right to establish one, and so it was enacted that no man should be kept in the service who was incapacitated, except temporarily; but the effect of that was not to discharge the incompetents whose salaries had been reduced, but on the contrary it really resulted in greater expenditure, because the heads of departments avowedly avoided obeying the law by not admitting that any of the men were incapacitated. This prevented their reducing them in pay as they had formerly, be-cause that would be an admission that they should be discharged, and so the real result of that effort to secure economy was, I fear, a still greater extravagance.

The heads of departments can hardly be blamed for reluctance to discharge a clerk who has grown old in the service and has no other means of support. Some system of pension would, I believe, be economical for the Government as well as desirable for the employees. I have always favored a contributory pension law, but I think almost any pension system is better than the present conditions, because now there is a practical pensioning of men who are no longer able to give the Government efficient service but who are kept on from sympathy; and yet, inasmuch as this is not authorized by law, no one can be sure of obtaining it or of its continuance, and so it makes a pension system of favoritism and uncertainty which must be galling to both the employers and the employed and is worse than any pension system we could adopt.

It is hard to arouse the interest of the House to these abuses, which they do not practically feel, but present conditions are expensive for the Government and unsatisfactory to the clerks. The exigency which prevailing high prices has so clearly forced upon the attention of every one offered a splendid opportunity for a thorough, fundamental, and permanent reclassification of salaries, and accompanying it with a retirement law, which would relieve the situation not only for the moment but for years in the future.

I think it is much to be regretted that the Committee on Civil Service, which I do not think has been overworked, should not have tackled this problem at this opportune moment, when the attention of Congress was forced upon it, and brought out some form of settlement. I admit that years ago, when we tried, we were not successful, but the thing has grown ever since, it is much more pressing with each advancing year, and an emergency like the present is, I fear, the only time when the matter can obtain a hearing at the hands of Congress, and I think it is most unfortunate that there has been no attempt to meet the present emergency by some such permanent and valuable solution of the whole problem.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, were it not for the fact that coming events cast their shadows before, I would not be tempted to speak upon this occasion.

It has been often repeated upon the floor of this House and elsewhere within the last few days that no one can tell what the morrow may bring forth.

The President of the United States has severed diplomatic relations with Germany. The President, in his address to both Houses of Congress on February 3, 1917, stated in part, after setting forth certain conditions:

I shall take the liberty of coming again before Congress to ask that authority be given me to use any means that may be necessary for the protection of our seamen and our people in the prosecution of their peaceful and legitimate errands on the high seas.

Again, in the latter part of the same address, this statement is made:

We seek merely to vindicate our right to liberty and justice and an unmolested life. These are the bases of peace, not war. God grant we may not be challenged to defend them by acts of willful injustice on the part of the Government of Germany.

You will observe that the President has used the words "for tion of aggression. It is a question of protection and selfdefense.

I trust that if conditions arise which prompt him to again appear before the American Congress, in accordance with the statements made in his former address, he will keep in mind the words "unmolested life," "liberty," "justice," "protection," defend."

I sincerely trust that he will not be influenced by those who, in this hour, are endeavoring to ally the United States Government with the entente powers.

I trust that the President of the United States at this critical time will not be influenced by that seer and prophet from New York—the editor of the North American Review—who has had some success as a diagnostician of political situations, and the bringing out of presidential candidates—the old-time friend and the new-time critic of the present President of the United States-the man who in a recent speech made in this city gloried in the thought of beholding the flower of American man-hood mingling in the trenches with the soldiers of England and France, from Flanders to Switzerland, and participating in the death and carnage on the blood-stained battle fields of the eastern world.

In reply I will say, if it becomes necessary to have trouble or war with any European power, let the United States Government settle that trouble or wage that war without the aid or consent of any other nation upon the face of the globe. plause.]

The question naturally arises, why should we as a free people take that position? In a few brief sentences I will endeavor to tell you why.

Because it means that we can all march shoulder to shoulder in a common cause.

Because for over 100 years our Nation has held a supreme position on the Western Continent.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SWEET. I will.
Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman think there is any doubt at all that in the defense of American rights simply the American can people would stand as a unit?

Mr. SWEET. They would for American rights.

Mr. BENNET. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. SWEET. But they propose to fight that war alone, if we have a war, without the aid or assistance of any other Government on the centle. [Appleuse 1]

we have a war, without the aid or assistance of any other Government on the earth. [Applause.]

Because we, as a free people, can not afford to ally ourselves with Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, or Japan, and thus make their cause our cause, and their grievances our grievances.

Because we, as a Republic, can not afford to ally ourselves with the monarchies of Europe, whose civilization has been constructed upon a wrong basis, and which has irresistibly led to one of the most terrible conflicts of all the ages.

Because we can not afford to lose our independence of thought and action in order to gain a seat at the council table when peace is finally declared. We can not afford to assume the obligations that may be imposed when the boundary lines of the nations of Europe are marked out and indemnities are awarded. We can not allow the nations of Europe to dictate to us.

Because we can not afford to submit our great resources, illimitable wealth, and the flower of our manhood to the keeping, dictates, and domination of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia.

Because we can not afford to form entangling alliances from the standpoint of the present, nor from the viewpoint of the not far distant future. The struggle across the sea is like a mighty whirlpool. It is easier to be drawn in than it is to get out after we are once in.

We can not afford to jeopardize the great principles of civil and religious liberty for which our forefathers fought and died to establish on this continent.

We can not afford to allow Great Britain or any other of the allied powers to do our thinking, conduct our negotiations, officer our armies, and command our forces on any foreign soil.

We can not afford to furnish millions of men and illimitable treasure to Great Britain when we remember that in the hour of dire extremity, when the life of the Nation and perpetuity of free institutions on this continent hung in the balance, she gave aid and succor to those who sought to destroy it.

We can not allow our military forces—the sons of freemen—to land upon a foreign shore and be subject to the orders and dictates of kings.

Because it may become necessary for us to declare war against Great Britain as well as Germany; for has not Great Britain the protection of our seamen and our people," and in the last repeatedly violated the rules of international law applicable to sentence quoted he used the word "defend." It is not a questine neutral nations, pilfered our mails, intercepted our cargoes bound to neutral ports, destroyed our commerce, and interfered with our freedom of the seas?

Are we to treat these acts of Great Britain as caresses and those of Germany as murderous?

Are we to take the acts of one nation as grounds for an alliance and friendship, and the acts of the other as a basis for war and hatred, when the acts of both nations have not been done because of any antipathy or sympathy for us, but because they are in the throes of a life-and-death struggle?

I am not justifying the acts of either; but should we, under all the circumstances, palliate the acts of one and condemn the acts of the other, or should we in good conscience protect American rights on land and sea and condemn all their illegal and inhuman acts, both great and small? Should we hold one to "strict accountability" and let the other pursue an uninterupted course? Why should we not hold both nations to a strict accountability "? rupted course?

Do not misunderstand me, gentlemen. I am not warring to-day with what the President has done in severing diplomatic relations with Germany. What I am contending for to-day is that the next step be taken with great care and deliberation.

Time has furnished abundant proof to the world that the United States Government, founded upon equality and the principles of representative government, is able to maintain the rights of its people and make them secure in their property, their happiness, their reputation, and their sacred honor.

America is opposed to militarism and hates war. America is not for peace at any price. America, in my judgment, when aroused, prepared, united, can maintain itself against all

We can not afford to allow the civilization of Europe to dominate our civilization. Their civilization has ignominously failed. Ours must and shall succeed. In the name of humanity America must forever be a dominant factor in the future history of the world.

Men may cry out, Peace! Peace! Universal peace! there will be no permanent universal peace of the world until the dominant nations of the globe have adopted the principles of free institutions [applause]; until it is impossible for one nation to declare war upon another except by the will of the sovereign people, as expressed through their chosen Representatives in Congress assembled; until the individual is enthroned in all the dominant governments on the earth.

When we are assailed from without we must not have dissensions within, but this does not bar the Representatives of a free people from discussing matters of great moment with can-Each department of government should keep within its constitutional limitations.

When a majority of the Representatives in Congress as-sembled have honestly determined upon a course against any foreign power, we must keep in mind the fundamental principles upon which our Government is founded-we must be united; we must all march one way, under one flag, and that the flag of our country.

I trust that the President will not form, or even propose, entangling alliances with any foreign power.

I trust that this Nation will not be drawn into the European [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Browne].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself for a few moments to the revenue bill which was passed a few days ago by this House and is now in the Senate, and in particular to an amendment which proposes to reduce tax on oleomargarine from 10 cents to 2 cents a pound, raising the tax on uncolored oleomargarine from one-fourth of a cent to the flat rate of 2 cents a pound. It is quite peculiar that this is the only great industry that comes before Congress at this critical time, when we need revenue, and asks to be taxed. Most every institution is trying to escape taxation, but the oleomargarine people come here and ask to be taxed, to pay into the Treasury of the United States about $10,000,000 a year, which the author of the amendment claims that this tax on oleomargarine will produce.

Now, let us examine the proposition a little. It is a peculiar one. Let us see what effect this tax will have upon the people and upon a great legitimate industry. In the first place, I claim that the raising of this tax from one-fourth of a cent to claim that the raising of this tax from one-router of a con-2 cents a pound, and which will raise probably $10,000,000, as they claim, will come out of the pockets of the poor man. To-day we manufacture in the United States about 150,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine. Ninety-seven and one-half per cent of this amount is uncolored and is sold to the consumer as uncolored oleomargarine. Now, the uncolored oleomargarine pays at the present time a tax of one-fourth of a cent a pound. 21 per cent of the amount we manufacture pays a tax of 10 cents a pound. And so if we raise this tax from a quarter of a cent to 2 cents a pound on uncolored oleomargarine it means that the common people, the people that buy uncolored oleomargarine, and know what they are buying, and who want it, want to buy something cheap, will pay this $10,000,000 that the Senate amendment produces. This money is going to come, therefore, out of the pockets of the poor people of this

Now, another effect it is going to have is this: When you color oleomargarine it immediately stands as a competitor in some degree with butter. That is why it brings a higher price. You go down to the Center Market here in Washington to-day and you find uncolored oleomargarine selling for about 19 to 20 or 21 cents a pound, while the colored oleomargarine, which is no better or no more wholesome, sells at from 32 to 34 or 35 cents a pound. The reason it sells higher is on account of the color. Now, when you take the tax of 10 cents a pound off of colored eleomargarine and allow it all to be colored it is going to bring up the price of oleomargarine, and the poor man is not only going to pay the 13 cents tax-this $10,000,000-but he is going to pay the increased price the colored oleomargarine will have when you color it. Thus for every dollar that the consumer of oleomargarine pays the Government he pays the large packing houses and oleomargarine factories from eight to ten dollars.

You can readily see, then, why the manufacturers of oleomargarine are asking the Government to tax them. When the cottonseed-oil people and the great packers pose as philanthro-pists beware, for there is usually a "colored man in the woodpile."

Now, what effect is the passage of the Underwood amendment going to have on the dairy interests of this country? It is going to bring down the price of butter. There is no question about it. Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Are you talking in behalf of these poor people you refer to or in behalf of the dairy people?

Mr. BROWNE, I am talking for both. Oleomargarine is perfectly legitimate, but people want to know what it is when they buy it, and I am against having it masquerade under the appearance and as a counterfeit of an article like butter.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Do you not believe it is unfair to tax any one industry at the expense of another industry, as they have done in the case of oleomargarine?

Mr. BROWNE. I consider that you are not taxing an industry. In answer to the gentleman's question it would be clearly unconstitutional to tax a legitimate industry for the benefit of another. But the Supreme Court of the United States fortu-nately has passed upon the very question that the gentleman from Illinois has asked. The Supreme Court of the United States in Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., p. 467) says:

States in Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., p. 467) says:

Now, the real object of coloring eleomargarine so as to make it look like genuine butter is that it may appear to be what it is not, and thus induce unwary purchasers, who do not closely scrutinize the label upon the package in which it is contained, to buy it as and for butter produced from unadulterated milk or cream from such milk. The suggestion that eleomargarine is artificially colored so as to render it more palatable and attractive can only mean that customers are deluded by such coloration into believing that they are getting genuine butter. If anyone thinks that eleomargarine, not artificially colored so as to cause it to look like butter, is as palatable or as wholesome for purposes of food as pure butter, he is, as already observed, at liberty under the statute of Massachusetts to manufacture it in that State or to sell it there in such manner as to inform the customer of its real character. He is only forbidden to practice, in such matters, a fraud upon the general public. The statute seeks to suppress faise pretenses and to promote fair dealing in the sale of an article of food. It compels the sale of eleomargarine for what it really is by preventing its sale for what it is not. Can it be that the Constitution of the United States secures to anyone the privilege of manufacturing and selling an article of food in such manner as to induce the mass of people to believe that they are buying something which, in fact, is wholly different from that which is offered for sale? Does the freedom of commerce among the States demand a recognition of the right to practice a deception upon the public in the sale of any article, even those that may have become the subject of trade in different parts of the country?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that a tax of a quarter of a cent a pound on oleomargarine would be a sufficient regulatory tax, if that were the intention of the tax?

Mr. BROWNE. I do not believe that uncolored oleomargarine should have any tax more than it now has of one-fourth of a cent per pound. The only principle upon which they tax it is so that it may go through the internal-revenue collectors' hands, and they can prevent it from masquerading as butter. That is the only reason,

Mr. GALLAGHER. Well, a quarter of a cent a pound tax would not mean the taking of $10,000,000 from the pockets of the people.

Mr. BROWNE. No. A quarter of a cent a pound tax would simply pay the expenses of the Government's revenue collector examining it. I am against coloring it at all.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. If I understand the gentleman's criticism, he seems to think that if the tax were taken off and oleomargarine were allowed to be colored it would very soon climb up to a price perhaps a little lower than real butter, but it would be in competition with the price of real butter?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.
Mr. BORLAND. And that the poor people who ought to be permitted to buy it for its true and intrinsic value would not have the opportunity to do it?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes. I made that point.
Mr. BORLAND. Yes. Then, assuming that this tax is not a tax at all, but is intended to kill off the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, how would the gentleman accomplish the purpose of giving the people more oleomargarine at its own intrinsic value? How would the gentleman accomplish that?

Mr. BROWNE. I would accomplish that by taxing uncolored oleomargarine one-quarter of a cent a pound-the way 971 per cent of the oleomargarine that is sold to-day is taxed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has control of the time.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BROWNE. I would tax it one-quarter of a cent, so that it would pay the United States Government for handling it and seeing to it that it is pure.

Mr. GALLAGHER. And regulate its sale?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes; and regulate its sale.
Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman recognizes the fact that oleomargarine is really wholesome?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes; I recognize the fact that it is wholesome, and the people who like it ought to have the right to use it. I think it is perfectly wholesome.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The gentleman will admit that butter is also colored?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes; butter is colored in the natural color of butter. In the wintertime butter is white, and it is colored to satisfy the trade.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. COLEMAN. Is it not true that fraud is perpetrated in certain quarters by coloring oleomargarine and selling it at increased price?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes; I think so.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is not done by the manufacturers,

Mr. BROWNE. No; I do not think it is done by the manufacturers but by those that handle it.
Mr. COLEMAN. It is done by the retail dealers?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE. I think so. The articles permitted to enter into the composition of oleomargarine, under section 2 of the present oleomargarine law, are as follows:

All substances heretofore known as oleomargarine, oleo, oleomargarine oil, butterine, lardine, suine, and neutral; all mixtures and compounds of oleomargarine, oleo, oleomargarine oil, butterine, lardine, suine, and neutral; all lard extracts and tallow extracts; and all mixtures and compounds of tallow, beef fat, suet, lard, lard oil, vegetable oil, annotto, and other coloring matter, intestinal fat, and offal fat.

All of those are allowed by the laws of this country to go into the manufacture of oleomargarine. It is quite a peculiar thing. I have had a great many letters both from farmers and also from others in regard to this proposed law. This same amendment is embodied in a bill before this House known as the Aswell bill. I received a letter the other day from the B. J. Johnson Soap Co., that has its offices in Milwaukee; New York; Chicago; Minneapolis; Detroit; St. Louis; Toronto, Canada; and London, England, with factories in Milwaukee and Toronto (they manufacture Palmolive soap), and this is what they say:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., January 31, 1917.

Hon. E. E. Browne,

Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: As the Aswell bill is soon to come before Congress, we ask you, as our Representative from Wisconsin, to do what you can to help pass this bill.

We are in favor of having the unjust eleomargarine law changed from a tax of 10 cents a pound on colored eleomargarine to 1 cent a pound on all eleomargarine, of changing the name from eleomargarine to mar-garine, of having all goods labeled "margarine" in large type, and also of having a list of ingredients of the articles printed on wrappers and containers containers.

We can see no more reason for taxing colored oleomargarine 10 cents a pound than for taxing colored butter, as most of the butter is artificially colored. If the tax should be reduced to 1 cent per pound on all oleomargarine, the revenue-office receipts would be increased by several million dollars each year and the consumers would be saving millions also.

ons also.

This would reduce the butter item in our "high cost of living" by 50 per cent.

This will not interfere with the farmer, for his milk will bring a big price for years to come on account of the condensed-milk and cheese price for years to come on account business.

Trusting you will see that the Aswell bill is for the benefit of the people of Wisconsin and the United States and that you will do what you can to insure the passage of this bill, we are,

Respectfully, yours,

B. J. Johnson Soap Co.,

B. J. JOHNSON SOAP CO., Per ALAN PORTER LEE.

I do not know whether these soap factories manufacture oleomargarine or not, but I imagine they do from their interest in this legislation; but I can see how, from the ingredients used, these two factories could be combined very readily.

Now, I want to say this, that oleomargarine was first invented during the Franco-Prussian War as a necessity as a substitute for butter, but France has had to legislate against it to protect the dairy interests, and Germany has, and every country in the world has had to protect the dairy interests against the oleomargarine interests. In France, Germany, and Belgium they will not allow oleomargarine to be sold in the same establishment or store as butter. It must be sold in a separate store. In Denmark they do not allow it to be colored, and it must also be sold in an oblong shape.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They also have many State laws here that cover sales.

Mr. BROWNE. Most of the States have laws to protect themselves against this, besides the general protection that is given the dairy interests by this 10 per cent tax. Now, the dairy interest in this country is too big and beneficial an interest to have Congress pass such a measure as this at a time like this without considering the measure more than this amendment has been considered, without the matter going before the Agricultural Committee and being discussed thoroughly. There are estimated to be about four and one-half million farmers engaged in the dairy business to-day in the United States, and the output of the dairy farmers in this country amounts to something like a billion dollars a year. My own State of Wisconsin produces annually something like $100,000,000 of dairy products. Our great dairy industry has grown up in Wisconsin by being protected by the State from frauds and counterfeits. The State has legislation that has gone through the Supreme Court, and the State has been respected in trainer to protect our dairymen from electroscentil. successful in trying to protect our dairymen from oleomargarine. We do not object to oleomargarine, but we want it be sold true to its name. The Senate amendment, when it strikes at the dairy industry, strikes at agriculture in general, because the dairy industry is a basic industry. We keep up the fertility of our lands by it, and its many by-products bring almost as much benefit as the industry itself. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Benner] five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the position taken the other day by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] that we ought not to discuss our troubled interna-tional relations. The Congress of the United States is the forum for such discussion. Having been absent for nearly two weeks on the business of the House, in connection with the Wall Street investigation, I have not heard the various speeches. But I have read them all. I wish to congratulate the House on having indulged in real discussion. The speeches have all been genuine arguments, from that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Bailey] at the one extreme, to that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] at the other.

The views of one who is so soon to leave public life possess trifling importance. But for what they are worth I submit them. What is our status? As President Adams and the House of his day expressed it, we are not a degraded people.

How to show this? By asserting and maintaining the rights of American citizens to live, possess property, and to use that property in usual and ordinary ways on land and sea.

We have wholly failed to do this in Mexico. A curious Mexican is said to have asked some Americans: "What will make the American people fight? We have destroyed your property, we have killed your men, we have killed your children, we have outraged and destroyed your women. The American people do not fight. What does make them fight?" How far is this from being an epitaph on our sovereignty?

Great Britain has flagrantly violated our rights on the seas. But she has not killed our people. On paper we have kept the record straight. This Congress, to our everlasting honor, has passed a law giving the President certain powers of reprisal and retaliation, and placed at his disposal for the purposes of that law the full use of our Army and Navy.

Germany has not treated our rights at sea with any more technical disrespect than has Great Britain. But she has killed our people and warns us that she will kill more.

When she plainly told us that she would disregard international law in a manner which meant the killing of more of our people unlawfully, she left no course open to the President but that which he took.

What ought we to do?

We authorized the President to meet the incursions of Great Britain by means which, if used, we deemed adequate. For the enforcement of that statute we the representatives of all the people gave him the Nation's Army and Navy. But while admitting and asserting the grave invasion of our rights we nevertheless did not declare war. The course of Congress was sober, sane, and not cowardly.

As to Germany, we should remember, first, that we have a just grievance against her entirely disconnected, so far as we are concerned, from her contest with the allies.

It is our rights that are being infringed. It is our duty to maintain those rights. In doing so we should use no aid from the allies and place ourselves under no obligations to them. We are big enough to look after ourselves. Germany says that she will sink our vessels on sight in the barred zone. We should meet this by putting proper cannon and skilled men from our Navy on our merchantmen, and, if necessary, by using our naval vessels to convoy our merchant vessels. This is the counterpart of the course which we followed with France during the administration of Presidents Washington and John Adams. That course stopped the aggressions of France, established us as a selfrespecting entity in the family of nations, and kept us out of dangerous alliances.

It is, at any rate, the proper next step.

Most people now see that there is no present necessity for a declaration of war against Germany. If we declare war, the following serious questions must be considered:

First. No nation has followed our lead and broken off relations with Germany. If, therefore, we declare war we definitely abandon our present position as the most powerful neutral and alone add strength to the allied side. We give up definitely, finally, and forever all right to speak for and with the neutrals after the war.

Second. We enter, as an interested principal, the tangled web of European diplomatic intrigue. We assume a part in the decision of questions in which we can have no possible concern.

Third. We give our European allies the right to be taken into consultation in connection with the affairs of the Western Fourth. As a practical matter we waive all the claims of our citizens, growing out of this war, amounting to millions upon millions, against Great Britain, France, and Russia.

Others will undoubtedly think of additional reasons of like weight. But those I have mentioned are serious.

If the President asks me to vote to put men and guns on our threatened merchantmen, I shall so vote.

American rights must not only be asserted but maintained. We may be compelled by events to do more than I have suggested in order to maintain those rights; if we have any hope for our future as a Nation we can not now do less. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from

New York [Mr. Siegel] such time as he desires.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, the question that is agitating the minds of the people of New York City, Philadelphia, and the other large cities of the East is as to when this Congress is going to take action on the question of obtaining for them food at prices that will give a reasonable profit to the men who are selling it to them. They find that both their pockets and stomachs are empty, although we are supposed to have prosperous times. We have witnessed in the city of New York, in my district and in other districts represented by gentlemen on the floor of this House, a series of riots resulting from the fact that noor of this House, a series of riots resulting from the fact that onions have suddenly risen to 18 and 20 cents a pound, when they were only 2 or 3 cents a pound a year ago. Sugar has risen to 13 cents a pound, when it was being sold for 7 cents a pound a year ago. Potatoes have suddenly jumped to $9 and $9.50 a barrel, when they were being sold at $3 a barrel a year ago. And so along the line. And it is not surprising, Mr.

Chairman, that our charitable institutions of the city of New York have had more applications for relief during the past few months than they had in the same period of time last year.

At the same time we all read in the newspapers yesterday, including the Washington newspapers, that twenty-old ships, loaded to the gunwales with food, including canned salmon and other foodstuffs that were canned, were leaving Norfolk for abroad. Simultaneously with that salmon went up 3½ cents a can in the city of New York. In other words, the pound cans that were sold for 14 cents suddenly sold for yesterday.

I might point out that the relief which the people are asking was promised them several months ago by my distinguished colleague from Brooklyn [Mr. FITZGERALD]. He stated in the newspapers—and I believe he introduced a bill that would temporarily put an embargo on foodstuffs leaving this country while prices continued so extraordinarily high. The people of New York City are commencing to wonder what has become of that measure and whether it is ever going to be discussed here. I introduced to-day a resolution requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission temporarily to place an embargo on all freight coming from Chicago east except food, coal, and the other things that are necessary for the proper maintenance of human and animal life. It reads as follows:

[Sixty-fourth Congress, second session.]

House joint resolution calling upon the the Interstate Commerce Commission to forthwith issue instructions prohibiting the movement of any freight for 60 days on all railroads running east of Chicago except foodstuffs, coal, and other commodities necessary to sustain human and animal life.

human and animal life.

Whereas the prices demanded for foodstuffs in cities east of Chicago are exorbitant in prices, the real cause of which this Congress can not in the short time remaining before it determine; and Whereas an extraordinary condition of affairs exist wherein food and coal are being sold at prices far beyond the financial means of a large number of people of the United States; and Whereas it is claimed by competent authorities that temporary relief can be had by the imposition of a temporary railroad embargo against all commodities carried by railroads running east out of Chicago except foodstuffs, coal, and other commodities necessary to sustain human and animal life; and Whereas it is claimed that the railroads are giving preference to freight carrying other merchandise, paying a greater revenue than is paid for the carrying of foodstuffs: Therefore be it

*Recolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it

Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, requested to forthwith issue instructions prohibiting the movement of any freight for 60 days on all railroads running east of and out of the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, eastward bound, except foodstuffs, coal, and other commodities necessary to sustain human and animal life.

I propose to call up that resolution if I possibly can and exert every effort to obtain the same kind of swift action on it that I obtained for the infantile paralysis resolution last year, through the courtesy of the Members of this House.

An editorial appeared in last night's New York Globe that analyzed the situation fully. I ask leave to insert it in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Globe, Feb. 21, 1917.]

THE FOOD SHORTAGE.

If 1916 the country produced 400,000,000 fewer bushels of corn than in 1915; of wheat, 400,000,000 fewer bushels; of oats, 200,000,000 fewer bushels; of barley, 50,000,000 fewer bushels; of potatoes, 100,000,000 fewer bushels; of barley, 50,000,000 fewer bushels; of potatoes, 100,000,000 fewer bushels. In these five crops production was down 1,150,000,000 bushels, or 10 bushels per capita.

A glance at these figures sufficiently indicates one cause of higher prices, and the cause is of such a nature as to suggest that noisy visits to the mayor will not remove it. The area of Greater New York is not largely given to food production. The mayor is not able any more than his visitors to improvise potatoes.

Yet things can be done that are not done. The American system of distribution is wasteful and extravagant. Speculators in supplies are permitted to extort. Retailing has overhead expenses that require too high a profit percentage. Toll takers of all kinds have successfully interposed themselves between producers and consumers. Rents going to landlords are higher in New York than in any other city in the world. We have no market system and attempt to get along with methods which may be appropriate to a village, but not to a concentrated population of 6,000,000.

These things have long been known, yet neither the City Hall nor Albany nor Washington does anything to the purpose. From time to time there are "investigations," but no results. Few are disposed to grapple with the realities of the situation, and when anyone makes any definite practical proposal he is fallen on by all sorts of special interests which have a pecuniary concern in perpetuating bad conditions. The public has no friends. It is a helpless hulk preyed upon by the grabbers and wasters, who fight from behind the intrenchments of an excessive individualism.

It is time to cease paying allegiance to outworn political formulas. The public has the right to protect itself. What we can not do Individually we must do collectively. If it is possible, for a change. If the community can save a dollar a ton on coal by all buying together, the dollar is worth saving. The welfare of profiteers should not be the dominant thought of our laws.

At the city hall, at Albany, and at Washington the cost-of-living problem should be attacked with a changed spirit. Most of the old assumptions should be scrapped. It is possible to cut in two distributing costs, and the yelping of those who now fatten on the waste should be disregarded.

Mr. SIEGEL. The New York Times printed the following article on February 20, 1917, and the figures emphasize the urgent necessity of Congress acting promptly:

Potatoes are reported from the Riverhead, N. Y., depot to have advanced to $3.25 a bushel to commission men; and few farmers have sold at that price, as they believed the price will go to $4 before the week is out. It was reported that 215,000 bushels of potatoes were being so held in and about this city.

City inspectors working in the big wholesale markets and on the plers have compiled a table showing the high and low prices of vegetables and fruits for 1916 and 1917, to date. The figures were arrived at by getting the wholesale prices in the different market places and striking an average. Here is the table, and it will show the housewife at a glance just how the food market has risen:

SHORTAGE OF FARM LABOR.

Cannel goods have advanced wholesale since the 1st of the month as follows: Pears, $1.50 to $1.70 a dozen; spinach, $1.50 to $1.65 a dozen; squash, $1.30 to $35; corn, $1.40 to $1.50; salmon, $1.90 to $2.10.

Four thousand boxes of tomatoes, said to be worth $1.15 a box, arrived on the Ward liner Monterey (from Progreso, Mexico). The greatest increase in any vegetable reported is in cabbages, which have gone up from $7 a ton, the lowest 1916 price, to $160 a ton. A report from Texas states that cabbages grown in that State have gone to $125 a ton in the home market. This is a record price.

A short crop of all vegetables raised in the Vineland, N. J., district may be looked for this summer. Farmers, it is said, contemplate planting only enough to care for immediate needs. This is because of the high cost of seed and the scarcity of farm labor. Seed potatoes, usually $3 a bag and now held at $10, are expected to advance at least $2 more later in the year.

Farm labor is now engaged in more remunerative work in the industries. Agents of manufacturers have been through New Jersey offering laborers $3 and $4 a day and furnishing them free transportation to the scene of their employment. A proposal has been made to call a convention of farmers in Cumberland and Salem Counties in New Jersey to see if it is not possible to bring in help to till the land. There is talk of utilizing negro or convict labor for this work.

The New York Times discusses to-day the food problem in an editorial, which I read:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 22, 1917.] THE FOOD DEMONSTRATIONS.

These food demonstrations are different. Neither the unemployed nor the unemployable are conspicuous among those clamoring for food. They are not asking for work, nor wages, nor charity, but for food. They are not asking for work, nor wages, nor charity, but for food. The complaint is not of inability to earn, but of inability to buy what the accustomed wage ordinarily supplies. No doubt shortage of supply is a contributory cause to the price movement, but the main cause is the urgency of concentrated demand. The ordinary restrictions upon buying are suspended. What we export is taken with disregard of price proportioned to the conditions which suspend all ordinary considerations of profit or loss, or cost of production, or the means of payment. The need abroad is greater than the need here, and the price paid abroad fixes the price paid here. Wages here have been established upon a scale which enables workers to pay extraordinary prices for whatever they want. Each supplies his need in turn according to his ability, and that is above the average, even among the demonstrators. They have seen times of greater distress than now. Their need is real, but nothing like that which they voluntarily endure during a strike. But under such conditions they suffer for a cause and are not driven to discontent by comparison of their distressful condition with unprecedented prosperity for others. Probably, also, agitators unfriendly to our institutions and labor leaders of various sorts have their share in fomenting the disorders. There are stories, too, of German activities in the promotion of discontent. Nevertheless, the fact remains that there is a demonstration of hunger for the poorest amid plenty for most.

The poor are now praying to be delivered from the reactions of an excessive prosperity as the rich have hitherto prayed. This distinguishes the present conditions from those when there was a deficiency of supply, not an inability to buy from a sufficiency of consumable goods.

Ultimately relief will come as much from difficult to explain this to the poor, and explanations are a poor remedy for empty stomachs. Nevertheless, other remedies will be incomplete.

Wasters of every degree are the worst enemies of the poor. They buy the goods which the hungry lack, and thoughtlessly pay whatever is asked. It is everyone's duty to buy closely and object to extortion even when it is necessary to submit to it. When farmers are asking $4 for potatoes and are storing them by the ton for higher prices they may be within their rights, but they do not go beyond the reach of public opinion. The lesson for those who can afford to buy freely is that they should take advantage of the many opportunities to economize. By so doing they would release commodities for the poor and aid directly in doing away with the conditions against which the present demonstrations are directed.

Mr. Chairman, the issue is here. It can not be evaded. Congress should act, and I hope it will do so promptly and relieve the terrible conditions that should not exist in a land

Mr. GILLETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McArthur].

Mr. McArthur. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday when the Reed amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill was under discussion I was unable to secure any time for the presentation of my views, so shall avail myself of this opportunity of entering my protest against what I deem to be an improper piece of legislation. I opposed the amendment for the reason that it imposes harsh and unwarranted restrictions upon the citizens of many States of the Union in denying them the right to settle for themselves the question of whether or not they may import liquor from other States for personal or family use. The amendment, among other things, provides that any person who shall order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be imported into States where the local manufacture and sale of liquor is forbidden by State law shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than six months, or both. The amendment does not restrict the shipment of liquor into "bone-dry" States, but into all States where local manufacture and sale is concerned-in other words, where breweries, distilleries, and saloons have been outlawed.

This amendment automatically transfers 14 such States to the "bone-dry" class without giving the people or the legislatures of these States an opportunity to say whether or not they desire such legislation. No more brazen disregard of the rights of our "free and independent States" and their citizens was ever witnessed in these Halls, and it was with deep regret and apprehension that I beheld a majority of the Members of this House vote for the amendment. It was amusing, however, to note that among these are many gentlemen who have been clamoring for a "referendum" on the national prohibition question.

When our Government was founded and our Constitution adopted, certain powers were delegated to the Federal authority, and all others not so delegated were reserved to the States. In the matter of local police power and the conduct of its citizens, each State was assumed to be supreme and enjoy the right to conduct its internal affairs without Federal interference. The State unquestionably has the right to regulate or to abolish the liquor traffic within its own boundaries, and by the terms of the Webb-Kenyon law—recently upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States—it is unlawful to ship liquors into "bonedry" States. In other words, the Webb-Kenyon law upholds and strengthens the rights of States to forbid the importation of liquor where such importation is contrary to State law. any State in the Union can become "bone dry" if it so desires, and the authority of the Federal Government will back up local authority in preventing importations from the outside. comes the Reed amendment, however, and prohibits the shipment of liquors to States that have expressly authorized their citizens to import liquor for their own use. While Congress undoubtedly has the right to prohibit the shipment of liquor in interstate commerce, sound public policy would demand that it refrain from so doing where the State specifically authorizes the importation. By adopting this amendment, Congress invades the province of State authority and strikes at the very root of local self-government-one of our cherished American rights. If this policy continues, our States will soon be reduced to the level of provinces and their citizens subjected to outrages and indignities that will rival the "carpetbag" régime in the South. When local self-government is destroyed the decline of the Republic will speedily follow. This is not idle speculation, but a conclusion inevitably reached by study of the history of ancient and modern times.

Gentlemen tell us that if this amendment works a hardship on the people of any State they can easily exclude themselves from the purview of its authority; that they can restore the brewery, the distillery, and the saloon. Let me call attention of gentlemen to the fact that in many States this question is constitutional, and constitutions are often difficult of amendment. Besides this, it is extremely doubtful whether any State that has outlawed the saloon will ever care to restore it, although many such States are willing to permit their citizens to import liquor for their own use.

Two elements were at work for the adoption of this amendment: First, the prohibitionists, and second, the breweries. The prohibition element has had much to say about a "referendum" on the national prohibition question, but closes its eyes to the manner in which the Reed amendment has been foisted onto the people of 14 States without any suggestion of a "referendum." The prohibition lobbyists here at the Capitol ought to blush with shame of forcing this issue at a time when the Nation is facing a grave crisis and when the attention of Congress should be centered upon questions of naval and military preparedness and other matters equally important in preparing the American people for any emergency that may arise. If the United States should go to war and prohibition is deemed necessary as a war measure, it should be considered as such, but there was no plea of military necessity urged in support of the amendment of yesterday.

I violate no confidence when I tell you that the brewing interests of the country urged the adoption of the amendment in question. Members of Congress yesterday received hundreds of telegrams, many of which I read, from the brewing interests, asking for an affirmative vote upon the amendment. The brewers undoubtedly believe that this drastic amendment will cause a reaction in many States and will cause them to repudiate prohibition altogether and resume their "wet" status.

Mr. COLEMAN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. McARTHUR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. McARTHUR. Yes; certainly.
Mr. COLEMAN. Does not the attitude of the brewing interests and the extreme prohibitionists, in their united support of the Reed amendment, indicate a total indifference to the fundamental rights of individuals?

Mr. McARTHUR. Yes. Mr. Chairman, it indicates an unholy alliance between the two extremes on this questionabsolute disregard of the rights of citizens of 14 States of this

This amendment is what is commonly known as a "rider." It has nothing to do with any question pertaining to the Post Office, for it is already unlawful to send liquor through the

I hold no brief for the liquor interests, and the adoption of the amendment is of no consequence to me or my welfare and happiness. I live in a State that recently adopted a "bone-dry" amendment to its constitution, although it is fair to say that my congressional district rejected this amendment by a majority of 9,799 votes. The people of my State are competent to conduct their own affairs, and I am sure they would resent any action of Congress in foisting upon them legislation of this character. Being "bone dry" they are in no way affected by this amendment, but if the situation were reversed and Congress, relying upon its right to regulate interstate commerce, were to legalize the shipment of liquors into "bone-dry" States, I fancy that my own State and many others would be heard from in no uncertain terms.

I stand unflinchingly for the full and free exercise of all American rights, both at home and abroad. If I were to do otherwise I would deem myself unworthy of being a Member of Congress or even an American citizen. I regard the amendment adopted by this House on yesterday as an abridgment of the rights of American citizens and accordingly voted against it. Such legislation is out of place in our American system of government. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Massachusetts I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully to the scientific explanation offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland] as to the collection of taxes from the people for the operation of the Government. I note that he said that the plan of direct taxation does not become a burden on the common people; that the common people, in other words, do not pay that tax, but that the taxes collected at the custom-houses are paid by the common people. Anyone that knows anything about taxation and the operation of any kind of business in this country or in any other country must understand that it does not matter where you collect the tax, it falls eventually upon the common people. If you collect the tax of the man who owns a large property which he leases to others, he simply puts a higher rental onto the common people who lease it. If you collect taxes for the Government off a man who operates a great works, he simply has to sell his goods higher or reduce the wages of his workmen; he does one or the other. The plan offered by the gentleman does not start one mill, factory, or mine when it is idle. It does not start one factory; it does not give any impulse to the sale of farm goods. Its tendency is to pull them back instead of pushing them forward—to create industrial stagnation.

The protective tariff has demonstrated so often that the gentleman is wrong that I want to recall a few instances. In the Democratic administration from 1892 to 1896 soup houses existed in every city in the land. Men were idle month after month—aye, year after year. Mills were idle; factories were idle; and mines were closed. Who, then, paid the tax?

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. I am not through with this particular charge yet, and after that I will yield. More than three years ago the Democratic Party again came into power with both Houses and the President, and then they tried the experiment of reducing the tariff. What happened? Over in the city of New York, in February, 1915, it was discovered by a committee appointed by the Democratic mayor of that city that in that month, in that city, at that time, there were somewhere about 380,000 idle workmen. At the same time the mounted police in Chicago had to beat the idle men back from the Chicago River bridges to keep them away from the congested part of There was estimated to be 200,000 men out of work. the town. Out West the governments of cities issued a nonstop order, men were marching from one place to another; they were looking for work and asking for bread, and they issued this nonstop order so that nobody should be permitted to stop, and the police patroled every city and kept them marching onward. Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Maybe the gentleman can explain what caused the soup houses and the bread lines in 1907 and 1908?

Mr. GARLAND. There were not any, and the gentleman can not prove that there were any.

Mr. BORLAND. What caused the soup houses of 1873, after 17 years of Republican tariff?

Mr. GARLAND. Eighteen hundred and seventy-three is a little mite before my time, but I read from history that that was a financial panic. But I do remember that in 1907 and 1908 there The difference between the stagnation were no soup houses. created by the Democratic Party and then was the difference between a financial and an industrial panic-men could not get employment and manufacturers could not operate, and every thing went to the bowwows. In 1907 and 1908 we did have work. It is true that money was scarce; it is true that we took scrip from our employers for our work instead of money, but we had work, and the scrip was good and accepted everywhere by merchants. It is common talk of gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House to say "Why do they sell articles abroad cheaper than you do at home?" when declaiming against protective tariff. It is evident that they forget that under every Republican tariff there is a drawback system, and any raw materials brought into this country can be made up in whole or in part into an article and the article taken out of this country and sold abroad without having paid any tariff in this country, and yet all the workmen that work on that article get employment by reason of that provision that operates so well in the Republican tariff. Under that provision the Government collects the tariff and on proof of the manufacturer returns it. There is from five to seven million dollars per year paid out by the Government in drawbacks, indicating that that much employment was brought in here for American workmen that we would not have except for a provision of that kind in the protective-tariff law. One per cent only is retained, and that is for the purpose of clerical cost of keeping accounts on the articles coming in for drawback purposes. These articles are sold abroad as American manufacture, and, of course, are sold cheaper than in this country. Just now you see another indication of extreme Democracy in control. You find over in New York City that while it is true that wages have not gone down, the effect seems to be as bad when the wages are high under a Democratic administration as it is in low wages under a Democratic administration. Two hundred thousand housewives, as the papers state, went to the mayor in the city of New York because their children were starving because they were unable to get money enough in the employment of the husband and themselves to buy the articles of food because of the high prices. That did not happen under a Republican administration, but it does under a Democratic administration, and under this system of taxation advised for and applauded by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, namely.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know something about the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended that the right to acquire the building at Pittston, Pa., reserving mineral rights, be granted. Under the general public-buildings act the Government gets title in fee, but in portions of Pennsylvania and even in Pittsburgh where land has been sold they reserve the mineral rights as though there were mineral rights, and it is impossible to get land there with an absolute right to obtain minerals. Consequently, they have been unable to construct a public building at Pittston. The bill simply proposes to waive that right and amend the statute which prohibits the acquisition of any land for public buildings with this reservation.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read. The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of the public-building act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., 876), which authorizes the acquisition of a suitable site, etc., at Pittston, Pa., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to add the following proviso, namely:
"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, accept a title which reserves or excepts all ores or minerals on the lands with the right of mining the same."

Mr. SMOOT. There is no appropriation involved?

Mr. SWANSON. None whatever. We have passed a great many bills of this kind relative to sites in Pennsylvania and other mineral States where it is impossible to get a title, unless the mineral rights are waived by the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to call up the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19937) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war. The report has heretofore been submitted and appears in to-day's Record.

The conference report was read and agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. I call up the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 18181) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report, and it was read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is a little bill on the calendar passed by the House relieving a military institute which was burned down in Georgia from a claim for Government equipment. It is recommended by the department. It has passed the House. They are about to reorganize and recommence work. It is essential that the bill should be passed. It will take but a moment. There is no objection to it. It is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Claims. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 16855) for the relief of Riverside Military Academy.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to object to the consideration finished business in charge, if he will not agree to unanimous consent to take up the calendar under Rule VIII for an hour and consider only bills to which there is no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. In view—

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator defer taking up the calendar until I may present a bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one word, please. Last night we took a recess until 11 o'clock instead of half past 10, as has been our custom lately, because the minority were to hold a conference this morning. I am advised that that conference has not yet adjourned. I am perfectly willing under these conditions to take up the calendar, laying temporarily aside the unfinished business until the conference has been finished. I do not desire to call up the revenue bill while the minority Members are absent from the Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator know how long that will be?

Mr. SIMMONS. A reasonable time.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be understood that only bills unobjected to will be considered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask, for that purpose, that the revenue bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. NEWLANDS. The conference has

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16855) for the relief of Riverside Military Academy.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Riverside Military Academy, at Gainesville, Ga., and its bondsmen be relieved of all responsibility on bond given to the United States by the Riverside Military Academy for the loss of two cutters and their outfits, valued at $1,408.77, which property was destroyed by a storm on the night of December 31, 1915.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to have read a telegram similar to a number that I have received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears

The telegram was read, as follows:

ANDREWS, FLA., February 22, 1917.

Hon. Duncan U. Fletcher, 1627 Sixteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.:

Your letter reached me some time ago, with copy of rivers and harbors bill, which I am sure the great majority of people in our country approve, as it provides for projects already neglected too long, in many instances where delay is not to the credit of our Government or in the interest of economy. Please urge to the utmost passage of this bill, as failure to pass this bill for some other provision providing a lump sum inadequate for needs of the country would be a public calamity.

J. H. Drummond.

PROPOSED EMBARGO ON FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire unanimous consent to introduce a bill and to have it properly referred. If I may be permitted, I should like to say just a word in reference to it. It is a bill to conserve the food supply of the United States, and to protect the people from extortionate prices by temporarily prohibiting the export of farm products, and so forth.

The bill (S. 8302) to conserve the food supply of the United States and to protect the people from extortionate prices by temporarily prohibiting the export of farm products, fish, game, and manufactured foodstuffs was read twice by its title.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I feel that the hour has arrived when, in behalf of cheaper food, the Congress of the United States should act. We read in the newspapers of women engaged in rioting in the city of New York, crying: "We want bread; we are hungry"; in Philadelphia we read of there being one dead and nine injured as the result of the riot, women calling: "We want bread; we are starving." The women were led by Mrs. Florence Shadle, 32 years of age. She carried a baby. In this land of prosperity, wealth, and plenty such a condition should be impossible. I believe there is food enough in this country for every mortal in it, but we are shipping to the warring nations of Europe millions of bushels of wheat, rye, corn, and potatoes, and tons of meat, while our own people starve. Think of it!

While Germany and the allies are battling with their great problems on the field, their citizens are clamoring for food. That they suffer great privation there is no question. But what excuse is there for us, with an abundant supply of every article of food, and when we are at peace with the world, for the existence of such conditions? I say there is none. I hold that it is unpardonable; indeed, Mr. President, it is little, if any, short of a crime,

The loaf of bread is squeezed in size almost to the vanishing point. Potatoes, which in 1916 were sold at $3.30 per barrel, to-day are selling for $9.75 per barrel. Onions, which were selling in 1916 at 75 cents per hundred pounds, to-day are selling for $15 per hundred. Cabbages, which were selling in 1916 for $9 per ton, are selling in 1917 for $160 per ton. All other staple commodities are advancing in proportion.

Mr. President, I insist that willful waste is a wrong to the verge of a crime. One may go this very night to the princely restaurants in New York, to the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, to the Imperial Hotel, or to a hundred others, and he will find revelry and waste going on to an extent and on a scale of extravagance that is alarming. There is no interference or molestation from the police as to them, but in another part of the city at the same time there is being made a demand for bread; there is a bread riot. Two women, Miss Ganz and Mrs. Harris, were pleading with the mayor of New York for food—for bread. read as follows:

Then came back the old wall that was the dominant note of the curious demonstration: "But these people are starving and want bread." It was Miss Ganz who spoke.

As soon as the committee left the city hall Miss Ganz took up a position on the steps and started to harangue the crowd. She told them the mayor was not in, and cries of displeasure were raised. Then she became more eloquent and was getting down to an old-fashioned "Sweet Marie" address when Inspector O'Brien gave orders that she be arrested.

Miss Ganz was hustled back into the city hall through the rear door and around to the traffic station in the basement. She was charged with disorderly conduct. She was arraigned later before Magistrate

Wylie in the Tombs police court. She was found guilty, but sentence was suspended. The magistrate advised her to take only small delegations to the city hall when she tries to see the mayor in the future.

In such a situation shall Congress sit mute and be blind to the sufferings of our fellow citizens? I understand that the Government of Great Britain has placed an embargo on our vessels coaling in their ports. Clearly we have a right to retaliate. Mr. President, an embargo on the staple food products will lower the price of these commodities and necessities instanter. I have here another list showing the marked advance in the price of food products, which I ask may be printed in the Record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TO ASK AID OF CONGRESS.

At a meeting of 2,000 men and women in the New Plaza Hall, Williamsburg, last night, it was decided to join with all pediers, retail grocers, and other dealers in foodstuffs in a movement to urge upon Members of Congress the necessity of doing something to reduce the cost of foodstuffs. An overflow meeting attended by 1,000 was held outside the hall. Speakers said protest demonstrations are taking place in many eastern cities.

Joseph Hartigan, commissioner of weights and measures, said wholesale fish prices in Fulton Market, as reported by his inspectors, show increases over 1914 as follows:

Fish.	Price yester- day.	Price 1914.	Increase.
Bass Bluefish Cod (market) Cod (steak) Flounders Hallbut Haddoek Mackerel (Spanish) Sea trout Salmon Sturgeon (lake)	.16 .09 .20 .08 .16	$0.14 .08 .03 .06½ .08 .06 .06 .06 .11 .10	$0.09 17 .05 .09½ .01 .14 .02 .09½ .07 .05

John J. Dillon, State commissioner of foods and markets, said people are now in revolt against a system that he has been fighting. Last year, he said, he tried to sell cabbage in this city for up-State farmers and all he could get was (?) a carload, or just about enough to pay the freight. Farmers became discouraged, he said, and permitted cabbage to rot on the ground. All this emphasizes the necessity of terminal markets where, he said, produce could be sent and sold according to the law and demand.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I earnestly plead for such disposition of the bill which I have introduced as will ultimately make it the law of the land and relieve this horrid situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

NATIONAL M'KINLEY BIRTHPLACE MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate-

Mr. SIMMONS. I recall that I said to the Senator from Ohio a while ago that I would consent to laying aside the unfinished business long enough to allow him to dispose of the matter he has in mind.

Mr. HARDING. I thank the Senator from North Carolina. I desire to ask that the bill (S. 8222) to amend an act to incorporate the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association may be taken up and passed. The bill does no more than to add four names to the original board of trustees. I should like very much to have the bill passed, so as to obtain the sanction of Congress for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 8222) to amend an act to incorporate the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association, approved March 4 1011 ciation, approved March 4, 1911.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, to insert, after the enacting clause, the words "That the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association, approved March 4, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:"; and, on page 2, line 18, before the word "section," to strike out the words "the amended," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association," approved March 4, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:
That the following-named persons, namely, J. G. Butler, jr., of Ohio; Myron T. Herrick, of Ohio; J. G. Schmidlapp, of Ohio; John G. Milburn, of New York; W. A. Thomas, of Ohio; Elbert H. Gary, of New York; Charles M. Schwab, of Pennsylvania; George W. Perkins, of New York; and Henry Clay McEldowney, of Pennsylvania, and their associates and successors, duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association, and by such name shall be known and have perpetual succession, with the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

SEC. 2: That the object of the corporation shall be to perpetuate the name and achievements of William McKinley, late President of the United States of America, by erecting and maintaining in the city of Niles, in the State of Ohlo, the place of his birth, a monument and memorial building.

SEC. 3: That the management and direction of the affairs of the corporation and the control and disposition of its property and funds shall individuals named in section 1 of this act, who shall constitute the authorized board of trustees, on the approval of this act. Vacancies caused by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled by the remaining trustees in such manner as shall be prescribed from time to time by the by-laws of the corporation. The persons so elected shall thereupon become trustees and also members of the corporation.

SEC. 4: That said corporation shall hold its meetings in such place as the incorporators or their successors shall determine.

SEC. 5: That the board of trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and may at any time be given, devised, or bequeathed to them or to the corporation for the purposes herein defined, and to purchase necessary lands for site and to sell and convey by good and sufficient deed any other lands that may be given, devised, or bequeathed to the corporation, and to convert the same into money; with full power from time to time to adopt a common seal, to appoint such officers and agents, whether members of the board of trustees or otherwise, as may be deemed necessary for carrying out the objects of the corporation is with full power for adopt by-laws and such rules or regulations as shall be business of the corporation; with full power for adopt by-laws and such rules or regulations as shall be demended to the components of the corporation of the corporation in such manner as in the judgment of the trustees will best promote the objects hereinbefore set fo

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association,' approved March 4, 1911."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 8252) to authorize the change of name of the steamer Charles L. Hutchinson to Fayette Brown.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1878) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the judicial code.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20496) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sallors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Key of Ohio, Mr. Keating, and Mr. Sells managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20827) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors

SENATOR FROM VERMONT.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I present the credentials of my colleague, Hon. Carroll S. Page, chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Vermont a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1917.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows: STATE OF VERMONT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1916, Carroll S. Page was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Vermont a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1917.

Witness his excellency our governor, Horace F. Graham, and our seal hereto affixed at Montpeller, this 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1917

HORACE F. GRAHAM, Governor.

By the governor: [SEAL.]

GUY W. BAILEY, Secretary of State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the Men's Club of the Church of Our Saviour, of Brookline, Mass., indorsing the action of the President, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Men's Club of the Church of Our Saviour, of the town of Brook-ne, Mass., in meeting assembled, unanimously adopts the following

The Men's Club of the Church of Our Saviour, of the town of Brook-line, Mass., in meeting assembled, unanimously adopts the following minute:

"After exhausting the resources of diplomacy in an effort to avert war, the President has now taken the only course consistent with national self-respect.

"War with Germany will not ensue unless the Imperial German Government knowingly violates well-settled principles of international law, and violates them with intent definitely hostile to the United States. In that event, war will inevitably follow, not by our own act but through the deliberate choice of a self-confessed disturber of the peace of the western world.

"If any honest doubt exists respecting the cause of war in Europe, the awful responsibility for extending it to this hemisphere will rest upon Germany and upon Germany alone.

"It may be that the Imperial German Government is misinformed respecting the temper of the people of the United States, just as that Government is supposed to have misconceived the sentiment of the British Empire at the outbreak of the European war. If so, and before fatal action based upon so grave a mistake is taken, Germany should be made aware of the essential unity of our people and of their loyal determination to make all sacrifices necessary to protect our liberty and to maintain our honor To this end we call upon all bodies similar to ours throughout the country and upon all groups of citizens organized for whatever purpose, to meet without delay and express themselves with no uncertain voice respecting the course that they will be prepared to follow.

"We urge all such groups of citizens, secular and religious, large and small, societies, clubs, and institutions of every sort to unite with us in giving immediate public expression to such convictions as those which we now solemnly record:

"First. That the act of the Executive in severing diplomatic relations with Germany is one to be approved and commended by all who have the best interests of the United States at heart.

"Second. That the German declaration of January 31, 1917, represents an unjustified and unjustifiable attempt to destroy the freedom of the sea and to abridge the commercial liberty guaranteed to us by established law and custom, and that if the Government of the United States were to acquiesce therein such action would be resented by all good citizens as in the highest degree pusillanimous and as altogether inconsistent with the spirit and traditions of a free people.

"Third. That the President will be justified in recommending to Congress the most extreme measures that may be deemed necessary to protect life, liberty, and property; and that it is our duty and that of all loyal citizens to tender immediately to the Government all the service of which we severally and collectively are capable.

"Fourth. That while all should stand ready to volunteer, if voluntary service is called for, yet Congress, in providing for our common safety, should not adopt emergency measures merely, but should definitely recognize the principle that the duty of defending the Nation rests equally upon all citizens capable of service. To the end therefore that the burden of safeguarding the country should no longer be cast exclusively upon the loyal National Guard and upon other particite military and naval volunteers Congress should be urged to exercise its constitutional power "to raise and support armies" by establishing immediately a permanent and democratic system of defense based upon universal service and training under direct and exclusive Federal control.

"A copy of this minute is ordered to be transmitted to the President control.

"A copy of this minute is ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of War and other members of the Cabinet, to the members of both congressional Committees on Military Affairs, and to every chamber of commerce in the United States."

GEO. S. PARKER, President.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the city council of Mal-den, Mass., indorsing the President's action in severing diplomatic relations with Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Northeastern Association of Fish and Game Commissioners of New York and New England, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to place under Federal control anadromous fishes on the Atlantic coast, which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a telegram in the nature of a pe tition from sundry citizens of Texas, praying for Federal censor-ship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee presented petitions of sundry citizens of Tennessee, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Burroughs Nature Club, of Naugatuck, Conn., favoring the migratory-bird treaty with Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Socialist Party of East Hartford, Conn., praying that the United States remain at peace, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Norwalk. Stafford, New Britain, Greenwich, New Haven, Falls Village, and Unionville, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OLIVER presented memorials of sundry granges, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed reduction of the tax on oleomargarine, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Clarion, Beaver, Boliver, and New Castle, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jeannette, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the protection of migratory birds, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of District No. 5, United Mine Workers of America, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for an investigation into the high cost of living, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Beaver County and Butler County, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government on Christianity, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the United People's Church of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying that the question of war be submitted to a referendum of the people, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of Mailers' Union No. 9, of Los Angeles, Cal., remonstrating against any change in second-class postal rates, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Medford, Oreg., praying for national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Portland, Oreg., praying that the United States remain at peace, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Vale, Oreg., remonstrating against the so-called "draft" provision for compulsory military service in the Hay-Chamberlain Act, which was ordered to lie on the table.

ALFRED B. ANDREWS.

Mr. CLAPP. For the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. Bryan], I report from the Committee on Claims, without amendment, the bill (S. 8297) for the relief of Alfred B. Andrews, and submit a report (No. 1105) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 8303) granting an increase of pension to James R. Rundlett; and

A bill (S. 8304) granting an increase of pension to Nathan H. Ellis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 8305) for the relief of Laurin W. Rolfe; to the Committee on Claims

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 8306) excepting certain classes of manufacturers and dealers from the operation of the provisions of section 5 of the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. STONE submitted an amendment authorizing the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Co. to pay to all depositors of said company a sum equal to the verified balances due said depositors at the time of its failure, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783), which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment providing for the erection of a medium-power radio station at Galveston, Tex. intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 20632), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WORKS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $80,158.73 to pay the Yosemite Valley Railroad Co. for amounts actually expended by it in building El Portal Wagon Road, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 20967), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 23d instant, approved and signed the following acts: S. 703. An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure:

S. 2222. An act for the relief of the heirs of Antoine Bayard; S. 5899. An act to punish persons who make false representations to settlers and others pertaining to the public lands of the United States:

S. 6850. An act authorizing transfer of certain retired Army officers to the active list; and

S. 7757. An act authorizing a further extension of time to purchasers of land in the former Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indian Reservation, Okla., within which to make payment.

THE LATE GEN. FUNSTON.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce that at the conclusion of the routine business to-day I shall offer a few remarks concerning the life and distinguished services of that brave soldier and great general, Frederick Funston, of Kansas, who recently died in the service of his country at San Antonio, Tex.

I wish to say in this connection, Mr. President, that I have desired to do this ever since the death of this great American citizen, but on account of the revenue bill being constantly before the Senate there has been no proper time afforded to do so. Therefore I shall take advantage of the first favorable opportunity to-day to deliver the address to the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Regular order!
Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana.

NEUTRALITY PROCLAMATION OF 1793.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in the patriotic Farewell Address of President Washington, read in accordance with the custom of the Senate on yesterday, Thursday, the 22d instant, reference is made to his proclamation of the 22d day of April, 1793, in the following brief paragraph:

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses ol. Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

The proclamation is a very brief one, Mr. President, and I ask that it may be read from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the proclamation, as follows:

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands of the one part and France on the other, and the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers.

I have therefore thought fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid toward those powers respectively, and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known that whoseever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forfeiture; and further, that I have given instructions to those officers to whom it belongs to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

my hand.

Done at the city of Philadelphia, the 22d day of April, 1793, and of the independence of the United States of America the seventeenth.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by E. T. Taylor, jr., one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18181) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19937) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 18566) for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE RILL REFERRED.

H. R. 18566. An act for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE REVENUE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes.

The Secretary. The pending amendment is on page 7, in the amendment of the committee, lines 15, 16, and 17, where the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson] proposes to strike out, on line 16 of the amendment, the words "July first" and in lieu thereof to insert "December thirty-first"; and on line 17 to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "nineteen," so that, if amended, it will read:

SEC. 208. Titles I and II of this act shall cease to be of effect on and after December 31, 1919.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Indiana by striking out "nineteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "eighteen."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is an amendment in the third

Mr. CURTIS. This is an amendment to an amendment, is it? The VICE PRESIDENT. It is. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know that I quite understood the Senator from Kansas; but if I caught his amendment, it was that this tax should not be levied except for the fiscal year 1918. That is the effect of it?

Mr. CURTIS. That was the effect of the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the tax would cease to be operative after that time?

Mr. CURTIS. But the Vice President tells me that it is an amendment in the third degree; so I will bring the matter up in another way

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the com-

Mr. WATSON and Mr. SMOOT called for the yeas and nays. Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, this amendment was offered Mr. WAISON. Mr. President, this amendment was offered for the purpose of limiting the time of the appropriations provided by Titles I and II of this act. The amendment offered by the committee provides that Titles I and II of the act shall cease to be of effect on and after July 1, 1921. I have offered an amendment that those titles shall cease to be of effect on and after December 31, 1919.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WATSON. I yield; yes.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand, the Senator from Indiana has a right to modify his amendment. I will ask the Senator if he will not modify his amendment so as to fix the date at December 31, 1918? I am satisfied that the amendment offered by the Senator carries this part of the bill for a longer time than he intended.

Mr. WATSON. Which I was about to state. In other words, because of the confusion existing between the fiscal year and the calendar year, this appropriation is being carried for three years under my amendment instead of two, as I originally designed to have it. Therefore I modify my amendment so as to read "December 31, 1918," instead of "July 1, 1921." In other words, it carries these appropriations for two full years.

This bill is designed for special preparedness, and it is simply a question about what "special preparedness" means. It is a question as to whether or not, under the plea of special preparedness, we desire to carry these appropriations for four years. My own thought is that if we have an abundance of revenue—which nobody seeks to deny—to take care of the exigencies that confront us, succeeding Congresses will perform their duty and their function; and I know of no reason why at this time we should add to the huge appropriations that are asked here for the purpose of preparedness when we shall have an abundance of revenue to carry this program forward for the ensuing two years. Therefore it occurs to me that there is no demand made upon us at this time to appropriate for four years to come, when we can carry forward our program for two years and thus meet the exigencies that confront us.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me? The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. And when developments may prove the unwisdom of a program adopted and provided for carrying forward four years at this time.

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the Senator that that point was

Mr. CLAPP. I know it was.

Mr. WATSON. And that I did not care to go over the entire argument again to-day. It may be that we shall not want this large naval appropriation at the end of two years. On the contrary, if the worst comes to the worst, larger appropriations may be necessary, or the emergency may become all the greater; and it is not fair for us to assume that succeeding Congresses will not discharge their patriotic duties and fulfill their patriotic functions. Therefore it seems to me that all that can be demanded of us at this time is to meet the emergency that confronts us by a limitation of two years, which is amply sufficient for present purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in the first place the amendment of the Senator from Indiana would limit the collection of this tax to one year, because the tax is only payable the year following, and the machinery for collection follows the year of the tax.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will permit me, that matter was argued out here last night, and the contrary view was established, I thought, to the satisfaction of everybody.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it was. It certainly was not to the satisfaction of the members of the committee or the Treasury Department.

Mr. SIMMONS., Mr. President, I dissented positively from that statement last night.

Yes; the chairman of the committee Mr. SMITH of Georgia. dissented positively from it. There is no doubt about the fact that, under the terms of the statute, the tax is returned the year following the year that the tax accrues. Your tax for 1917 is returned in 1918 by the 1st of March. Then it is payable by the 1st of June, I believe, or the 1st of July. So that the terms of the statute, as amended, limit the tax to four years. The addition of six months, carrying it to July 1, 1921, was intended to leave the machinery in force for the collection of the tax; that was all. It was not intended that the tax itself should last more than four years. It may be that a little further explanation should be added to that provision declaring that the continuation beyond January 1, 1921, is only for the machinery of collection.

One word more, Mr. President, about the necessity for this tax. We have already made the appropriations that go through these four years. The Senator from Indiana suggests that we will not have to continue this line of preparedness, this line of Well, we can stop those appropriations the very construction. moment it is determined wise to stop them; and whenever that is done I am sure Congress at the same time will repeal this

I hope we may, by the end of two years, be able to slacken up on military construction. I hope so. I long that that may be true; and if it is true, then I should be perfectly delighted to stop this tax. But at present we have made the appropriations running through the four years.

Mr. SMOOT. Not four years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; we have not made the appropriations for four years, because we could not.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we could not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have outlined a class of work that is to run through that period, however.

Mr. SMOOT. You have a building program. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have authorized contracts; we have made a program that would involve the four years; and we are seeking through this proposed revenue bill to meet that line. If we can stop that program, and do, pending these years, we certainly will be glad at the same time to stop this tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken when he says that there have been appropriations made for four years. He is also mistaken when he states that there has been an authorization for a program to be carried out in the next four years. All that there has been done is this-a tentative program has been agreed to. Congress can appropriate for it if it wants to, or Congress may not appropriate, as it decides

The amendment offered to the bill by the Finance Committee of the Senate reads as follows:

Titles I and II of this act shall cease to be of effect on and after July 1, 1921.

Under this bill the tax will be levied upon the incomes and the profits for the year 1917. Of course it will not be collected until June 1, 1918, but it will be imposed for 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921 if the amendment is agreed to in the Senate.

The Senator from Georgia says that they can repeal the law in two years if it becomes unnecessary to collect the additional taxes. The best way to do that would be to provide only that they should be collected for two years, and then, if conditions were such at the end of two years as to justify it, pass a resolution or put this same provision for another two years in a naval appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on that point the naval bill is the heaviest bill we have, so far as appropriations are concerned.

Mr. SMOOT.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.
Mr. LODGE. I have just been taking part in making up that bill. The appropriations are all made as usual for the year.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. Mr. LODGE. The only difference that exists is that we have made extra appropriations in order to expedite the work, and have made larger appropriations than usual for the authorizations, with the view, of course, of getting the ships as rapidly as possible; but that means that the money will be spent more rapidly than usual. It is not delayed for four years. On the contrary, the expenditure is hastened.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of the imposition and collection of the tax.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. Something was said about appropriations running four years. We are reducing the time as much as we possibly can in the Navy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I stated last night, when this same question was up, that the appropriations for this year exceeded even the program that was mapped out, for the reason that it is desired to hasten the completion of the program, and the Navy appropriation bill carries $531,000,000 this year. year it does not necessarily follow that that same amount will be appropriated.

Mr. LODGE. Unless there is war, next year's bill will not carry anything like it.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator says, unless there is war it will carry nothing like it. If there is not war, and it is not necessary to appropriate $531,000,000 next year, this tax will be imposed and collected, however, if this amendment is adopted.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think that the modified amendment of the Senator from Indiana making it December 31, 1918, the end of the calendar year, is long enough to have the law in force. Then if war should happen by the end of the year 1918 a similar provision could be included in the Navy bill at that time.

Not only that, if war does come the $531,000,000 will not be sufficient. I take it for granted, if war comes, a bill will be passed through Congress, in my opinion, quickly as possible authorizing the expenditure of a billion of dollars for the early purchase and forced construction of battleships and auxiliaries

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course what the Senator suggests would be physically impossible, the immediate construction of battleships

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say-

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment, if the Senator please; I am not going to detain him. Even the immediate construction of the smaller sort of war vessels, cruisers or submarines or submarine catchers, could not be provided in the manner the Senator suggests in the case of a war. We must have time to build these instrumentalities of national defense. tion of the smallest of them would require at least one year. Hence the importance of the adoption of that provision in time of peace, because of the impossibility of securing them in time of war and of sufficient speed to adequately provide for national defense.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator would be perfectly right if I had said the construction, though perhaps it would be possible for the Government of the United States to purchase colliers and other auxiliaries of our Navy. That is what I had in mind. Of course the Senator is correct as to the time it takes to construct the smallest ship for national defense. In fact, the Senator said one year, but under conditions to-day I have not a doubt but that it would take two years.

The amendment spoken of by the Senator providing for additional submarines I am in hearty sympathy with. Two years ago I offered an amendment to the naval appropriation bill authorizing the building of 75 submarines. I have every reason to believe that if a point of order had not been made against the amendment to the naval appropriation bill at that time the Senate of the United States would have voted the authorization of the construction two years ago of 75 submarines. So I want to say to the Senator that it will give me great pleasure to vote for the authorization of the construction of the additional submarines provided in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I sincerely trust the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana will be adopted. There is no reason to have the imposition and collection of the tax unless it becomes necessary, and we will know by the end of the calendar year 1918 whether it is necessary to extend it beyond that time or not.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I trust that the chairman of the Finance Committee will accept the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. It is offered in a sincere desire to improve the bill. Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not want to take time. I stated my position very fully last night on this subject. I can not accept the amendment. I do not think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know but that the Senator might have changed his mind overnight, as frequently happens, and be prepared this morning to accept it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not. I am as strong in the belief that the amendment ought to be adopted as reported by the committee to-day as I was last night.

Mr. PENROSE. So my hopes are shattered. Mr. SIMMONS. They frequently are.

Mr. PENROSE. As the Senator says, they frequently have been.

Mr. President, I entirely agree with what the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] has said about the fact that this amendment will not in any way interfere with these expenditures. agree with him when he says that the money may not be needed. I do feel quite confident that if the money is not needed for preparations to enlarge the Army and the Navy and in fortifications for defense in war some alluring product of Government ownership or some socialistic governmental activity will be discovered by the Democratic majority to exhaust any funds that may be left remaining to maintain the ever-recurring deficit in all its flourishing prosperity.

Mr. SMOOT. I apologize to the Senator for even suggesting that the amount of money would not be needed.

Mr. PENROSE. Not only would this amendment not interfere with the legitimate expenditures for defense, but it is desirable, in my opinion, for another reason. The most superficial examination of this measure will convince any person that it is crudely drawn and its purposes are not altogether stated in a candid way. The title reads: "An act to provide increased a candid way. The title reads: "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes."

We were told last summer, Mr. President, when a previous burdensome bill imposing direct taxes was pending with a similar title that the estimated revenue to be raised thereunder would be amply sufficient to meet these military and naval ex-penditures and to provide for any deficit which might be expected in the future.

Mr. President, I think I should like to have order in the

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. PENROSE. I said at the time and other Members of the minority said that the bill would fail as a revenue producer, will continue my remarks when order is restored.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. PENROSE. I believe I have stated that the title of the bill is misleading. As predicted last summer, the then pending measure has failed to raise revenue, and the deficit still exists. The title of this measure, in my opinion, should be "to defray the expenses of increased approprations for the Army and Navy and to meet the deficit and the bankrupt condition of the Treasury of the United States due to wasteful extravagance and unnecessary expenditures." Not only is this measure expected to raise-Mr. President, I recognize that this bill has been fully considered by the Democratic caucus, and that public discussion before the American people does not interest the Democratic majority; but I think at least courtesy should be extended to minority Members when they are discussing the measure in good faith, and those Members of the Democratic majority who desire to indulge in noisy conference should adjourn to some other part of the Capitol than the Senate

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PENROSE. For an inquiry? For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say that I think the remark made by the Senator is very timely. I have noticed several times when we have been speaking on this side of the Chamber that the Senator from Pennsylvania has been a conspicuous offender in the same direction.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I have no doubt that have not been entirely free from this offense. Sometimes the gentlemen on the other side address the Senate in such an inaudible tone that it is difficult to tell whether they are addressing the Senate or talking to themselves.

THOMAS. When the Senator whispers he is never inaudible.

Mr. PENROSE. Many of the speeches which have been delivered with great vociferousness have not yet appeared in the Congressional Record even for examination by the minority.

This measure, Mr. President, goes out of its way to lead to the impression that it is for preparedness. Section 1 says:

That the receipts from the tax imposed by title 2-

That is, the receipts under this peculiar taxation in the pend-

And one-third of the receipts from the tax imposed by title 3 of this act shall constitute a separate fund in the Treasury to be used only for the expenditures incurred under—

And then the acts of this Congress and the last Congress are recited providing for expenditures for the Army and Navy and for fortifications. In addition the paragraph goes on to say:

In addition to such receipts from the taxes imposed under Titles II and III of this act, there shall be credited annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, to such separate fund, the sum of $175,000,000, such sum being the estimated additional revenue to be derived under the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, in excess of the revenue to be derived under then existing laws.

Here is a deliberate attempt, Mr. President, to convey to the people of the country and to the legislators the thought that this oppressive and burdensome tax measure is primarily intended to be for the purposes of military and naval development. But mark the caution which follows this effort on the part of the majority lawmakers. Read the proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may use such fund for her purposes, but such fund shall be reimbursed for any portion other purposes, thereof so used.

Is there, Mr. President, from here to China and from to-day back 500 years a more childish, a more grotesque, a more inane, a more ridiculous provision than this proviso herein contained? A whole paragraph solemnly setting forth that a fund should be consecrated to a certain purpose, and then a proviso saying the Secretary can use it for some other purpose, but if it is used for some other purpose the fund shall be reimbursed. How? By another bill? Heaven help the reimbursement, if the majority can pass appropriation bills encreaching upon this fund so ostentatiously proclaimed to be for the purpose of na-tional defense. It is humiliating to feel that a tax bill of this magnitude, calculated to paralyze thrift and industry and precipitate bad times, should be made ridiculous and childish by a provision of this kind.

Smoot

I for one think that two years is ample time to permit legislation of this character to remain upon the statute books. look fondly forward to the hope that sanity will return to the American people, and that a House and Senate of a different complexion will exist at the end of that period to restore legislation by the two Houses of Congress to the high standards of statesmanship, which have usually prevailed in the history of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator mean to intimate that the people of the United States are now insane?

Mr. PENROSE. I do not, Mr. President; but I doubt the sanity of some of the representatives of the people.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator hopes for a return of sanity to the people. I wonder if—
Mr. PENROSE. I am unwilling to be further interrupted.

I am about to conclude.

That is about all I have to say at this time, Mr. President, on the pending amendment. As the discussion progresses shall call attention to other inconsistencies in the measure; but as we read the subsequent pages we will come to no more ridiculous provision, no more inane provision, unworthy of the authors of this measure, than that which loudly proclaims the setting aside of a fund for a noble and patriotic purpose and then taking the precaution to say it has a string to it; we will take the money back whenever we feel like it:

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from Utah, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, I desire to say that Congress will be in session in December again; that should there be no extra session it is bound to meet for the long session in Decem-So there will be plenty of opportunity to extend the time if it is necessary. Then, again, Congress will meet a year from December, which will give some thirty-odd days in which to act upon this matter and extend the time if it should be necessary. I hope the modified amendment of the Senator from Indiana will be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson] to the

Mr. SIMMONS. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?
The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been requested on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment. Is there a second to the demand?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. The understanding is that the amendment has been modified to read "December 31, 1918."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is compelled to be absent to-day. If present, I do not know how the Senator from Maryland might vote on this question. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who is absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. Townsend's name was called). My colleague [Mr. Townsend] has been called away from the Chamber by sickness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick], who, I understand, is detained from the Chamber on account of sickness. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. Sutherland] and will permit my vote to will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. COLT. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. Saulsbury], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to be excused from voting, Mr. President.

Mr. CLARK (after having voted in the affirmative). President, for fear there may be some misapprehension, I desire to state that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Stone]. I have voted, but the Senator from Missouri, although afterwards in the Chamber, did not vote, and stated that he withheld his vote because of his pair. Believing that the Senator, had he voted, would have voted with his party, I shall withdraw my vote under the circumstances.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the follow-

NOT VOTING-21

I move to strike out from the pending bill, Mr. CLARK. beginning in section 1, down to and including line 21, on page 2. I offer that amendment, unless there are some other committee amendments still to be considered.

Mr. SIMMONS. What section of the bill is it the Senator from Wyoming moves to strike out?

Mr. CLARK. I am told that my motion is not at present order.

Mr. LODGE. I understood that the committee amendments were to be disposed of before individual amendments were of-

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I will say, for the information of the Senator from North Carolina, that my proposed amendment is to strike out section 1 down to and including line 21, on page 2. I will offer the amendment at the proper time.

Mr. SIMMONS. That amendment, I think, would not be in order at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 7, inserting lines 15, 16, and 17.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to hear what the amendment is.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have just rejected an amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Watson] to modify the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. The committee proposes, on page 7, beginning in line 15, to insert:

SEC. 208. Titles I and II of this act shall cease to be of effect on and after July 1, 1921.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The Secretary. The next amendment of the committee is found on page 10, line 7, after the word "opportunity," to insert the words "to subscribe."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, wherever there is a section in which an amendment occurs I should like to ask that the section be read, so that we can really know what the amendment

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it was distinctly understood last night that the paragraph which contains an amendment should be read in full.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator wants the whole of that title read?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes. Mr. SIMMONS. There is only one amendment in section 400 of Title IV, and that section covers nearly two pages. The Senator wants the whole thing read? Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the entire paragraph or section in which amendments occur.

The Secretary proceeded to read Title IV, section 400, as follows:

Sec. 400. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time such sums as in his judgment may be required to meet public expenditures on account of the Mexican situation, the construction of the armor-plate plant, the construction of the Alaskan Rallway, and the purchase of the Danish West Indies, or to reimburse the Treasury for such expenditures, and to prepare and issue therefor bonds of the United States not exceeding in the aggregate $100,000,000, in such form as he may prescribe, bearing interest payable quarterly at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum; and such bonds shall be payable, principal and interest, in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and both principal and interest shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and shall not be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks: Provided, That such bonds may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, giving all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity.

The Secretary. At that point, on page 10, line 7, after the

The Secretary. At that point, on page 10, line 7, after the word "opportunity," it is proposed to insert the words "to subscribe."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that this amendment extends an equal opportunity to all the citizens of the United States to subscribe to a loan for certain purposes. I note that one of the purposes for which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States is "to meet public expenditures on account of the Mexican 'situation.'" "situation" is rather an extraordinary one to The word occur in legislation of this character, and particularly in connection with a loan. I do not recall that the history of financial legislation in several hundred years of parliamentary government in any free country gives an instance of a loan of some $200,000,000 or any other amount borrowed for a "situation." I have know of loans to be incurred for a war, or an epidemic, or a flood, or for starvation, or for an invasion, but here it is proposed to make a loan of $200,000,000 for a situation."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A chronic situation.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; "a chronic situation." What is the nature of the "situation," Mr. President? When did it begin? When will it end? What is it? Where is it located? Who produced it? Is any one in this broad land willing to acknowledge the parentage of this "situation"?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is there one?
Mr. PENROSE. Yes; is there one? Is it left unclaimed, a foundling on the doorstep, humiliating to the householder on whose doorstep it is found, because it invites suspicion regarding the daily circle of his routine life?

I am curious to know, Mr. President, why this radical innovation in the phraseology and terminology of fiscal legislation finds a place here, so that in the future the legislator and the historian may have an accurate definition of what a "sitution" is. I invite the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to the propriety of adding a proviso defining a "situation." Is this a good "situation," Mr. President, or a bad "situation"? Is it a critical "situation," or is it some other kind of situation? When these American citizens are invited to subscribe to this loan and march up to the desk to put down their hard-earned wages to raise this $200,000,000, they will inquire what is the "situation" for which they are putting up their money; and I ask, in all seriousness from the chairman of the committee, or from any other Member of the majority, whether they can give the Senate any information as to this "situation." I have known of loans to be incurred for a war.

Has any estimate been made as to this "situation"? Will the pending revenue bill be ample and sufficient to meet the requirements of the "situation" as long as it may continue? it likely to continue indefinitely, or is there a fixed time ahead which we may all contemplate when this "situation" may end? Is this "situation" serious, or in the nature of a vaudeville performance?

These are inquiries which will naturally arise in the breast of the prospective investor. I think the country is entitled to have a little more definite information as to why this very large sum of money is to be asked from the savings of the American people. I think they are entitled to know a little about what the "situation" is.

One question which will naturally occur is, whether any part of this money is to defend the lives of American citizens or the honor of American women or the property of our people wherever it may be located, or whether we shall continue to march up the hill and march down again? It is an expensive proceeding, Mr. President, apparently without any definite result. We recall one situation where we were "too proud to fight," and then another situation, later on, where we were ready to fight anything in sight. We recall a situation where we marched into Vera Cruz to compel a salute to the American flag, and where we subsequently withdrew without any flag or individual being saluted, at considerable expense to the arry. We recall a still later situation when we marched very boldly across the border in pursuit of Villa and his associates, who had had the presumption to cross over into the domain of the United States; and as far as any observer can ascertain at this distance, Villa and his forces have continued to be as active up to the present time as they were when this "situation" arose, after an expenditure of some lives and many million dollars

I think that this is one point on which I am really entitled to have information from the chairman. He has not seen fit to explain this measure in any considerable detail; but as this proposition involves taking money from the pockets of the taxpayers, I think he ought to enlighten us on it. Is this Mexican situation in the nature of a "get-rich-quick" concern, Mr. President, for which money is taken from the taxpayers upon some plausible and rainbow-chasing prospectus? In that case, let it be branded with the proper term, "Get poor quick" and get dishonored quick."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what has transpired during the last 10 or 15 minutes makes very clear, I think, the purpose of the minority with reference to this bill. We are now considering an amendment adding one word to section 400. Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, we can not hear the Senator. Will he speak a little louder?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am speaking loud enough, I think, for the Senator to hear me. That section covers nearly two pages. The only amendment made to it-

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not suppose it makes any difference to the chairman of the Finance Committee

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not yield. Mr. PENROSE (continuing). But no one can hear the Sen-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know I was interrupting the Sena-I could not hear him.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is one of the tricks of the Senator from Pennsylvania-to profess not to hear anybody on this side of the Chamber. It has become quite stale. The only amendment made to that section is to add the words "to subscribe" in line 7 of the tenth page. This amendment proposes to insert in that section two words that evidently were inadvertently left out. That is apparent from a reading of the In considering this purely formal amendment the time of the Senate is taken up to read two pages of printed matter.

Of course, Mr. President, if the minority desire to take advantage of the situation that now exists, there being left only about seven days, excluding Sundays, between now and the time this session of the Congress will automatically expire, they can, by the unnecessary consumption of time, defeat this bill, and they can defeat the appropriation bills to provide money to pay the necessary expenses of preparedness which have had the sanction of their party.

I do not know why the minority apparently have reached the conclusion that there shall not be such legislation at this session as will be necessary to avoid the necessity of an extra session; but I feel quite confident that their attitude with reference to this little perfunctory amendment can mean nothing but a deliberate purpose to prevent the passage of this necessary legis-The Senator from Pennsylvania consumes the time of the Senate about another matter which is so clear, which, looking at it even from his standpoint, is so irrelevant to the amendment, that the impression gained from their action with reference to the addition of the words "to subscribe" is further enforced.

Of course, Mr. President, the purpose for which these bonds are issued is well understood. On account of the Mexican situation-and the words are sufficiently descriptive to indicate what is meant-it will be necessary to raise $162,000,000, the estimated expense of that situation, in order to reimburse the Treasury for money expended from the general fund to meet this indebtedness which was not provided for at the last session. At the last session of Congress it was stated and understood that no definite estimate was made or could be made as to the expenses of the Mexican situation. It was impossible to make satisfactory estimate. It is always impossible, when you have a situation of that sort, until after the situation has developed itself more fully than it had at that time, to estimate closely what will be the cost. It was thought then by the department that the cost to December 31, 1916, of that situation would amount to about $130,000,000. It has since been ascertained that it will amount to $162,000,000 by June 30, 1917.

Because of the inability of the department to make a proper estimate, it was stated that there would be no provision in the revenue bill passed at the last session from which to pay the expenses of the Mexican situation, but that under the general law giving authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Panama bonds the expense of that situation would be met by an issue of those bonds in whatever amount was necessary.

The Secretary did not issue those bonds, but from day to day has paid the expenses out of the general fund in the Treasury. That brought about a deficit of $157,000,000. This bill proposes now to reimburse the Treasury of the United States, not an indefinite amount, but an amount estimated to be $162,000,000. So that the bonds proposed to be issued in this title are to cover, first, the expenses incident to that situation up to June 30, 1917, estimated at $162,000,000; the construction of the Alaskan Railroad, $35,000,000; the armor plant, $11,000,000; and the Danish West Indies, $25,000,000, making $233,000,000. We have authorized heretofore an issue of $50,000,000 of Panama bonds to meet the expenses under the shipping act and $20,000,000 for the cost of the nitrate plant, making $70,000,000 of these bonds already authorized. That will make a total of bonds to be issued of $303,000,000.

There are only $222,000,000 of Panama bonds in the Treasury which can now be issued. That will make it necessary, in order to meet these expenses, to issue $81,000,000 in new bonds; and this title authorizes the issuance of as much as $100,000,000, not more—only as much as may be necessary, but not more than $100,000,000 of bonds-to defray these expenses.

I do not think it is necessary to say anything further in reply to the questions and the argument of the Senator from Penn-

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course I assume that the bill is now being considered for committee amendments

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is right. The amendment is found on page 10, line 7, and proposes to insert the words to subscribe."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand where the committee amendment comes in; but it seems to me the Senator from Pennsylvania was quite within his rights and quite justified in asking for information upon the language of this paragraph. Section 400 provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time such sums as in his judgment may be required to meet public expenditures on account of the Mexican situation—

For one item. Mr. President, whatever may have been in the minds of the committee, I do not know, but that language, if it is left to stand as it is written, would allow the Secretary of the Treasury at any time in the future to issue bonds in such sums as in his judgment may be required to meet public expenditures, if they were only made on account of the Mexican situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator lose sight of the fact that the issue is limited to $100,000,000?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not lose sight of that fact, and of course I do not mean that he could issue bonds in a greater amount than the act authorizes him to issue. So far as anything in the act is concerned, however, not one penny of expenditures made in the past in the conduct of military operations on our part in Mexico need be paid by these bonds, but if somebody should decide that the troops should be sent back into Mexico, and it were necessary to provide additional money, these expenditures made in the past could be left unpaid, and the entire amount authorized by this act could be used for future expendi-

I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that I think there ought to be an amendment. If it is designed to pay expenditures already made, the bill should so state; and at the proper time, if nobody else does it, I shall offer an amendment, after the word "expenditures," in line 12 of page 9, to insert the words "heretofore made."

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator understands that this $160 .-000,000 estimated for the Mexican situation includes the money that has already been spent on account of that situation and that which it is estimated will be spent during the remainder of this fiscal year.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I had no understanding about it except the language of the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is an estimate. Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the reason I was asking information of the chairman, as to whether I understood the chairman of the committee correctly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether the Senator knows what I mean or not.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill authorizes the issue of $100,000,000 of bonds. Upon the basis of $162,000,000 expenditure it would require only $81,000,000 of bonds to meet these different items; but we can not say with absolute definiteness what may be the increased expenditure on account of the Mexican situation between now and the end of the fiscal year. This, however, is to meet an estimate of $162,000,000 for the Mexican situation up to the 30th day of June of the present fiscal year.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that is simply to say, when anybody asks what this Mexican situation is, that Congress is asked to appropriate not to exceed $100,000,000 to provide for it, a part of which the Senator says is to be spent away up until the end of this fiscal year. What is the Mexican situation now, that Congress is asked to appropriate it blindly without knowing anything about what it is to be used for?

On the admission of the Senator from North Carolina, if I understood the Senator from North Carolina correctly, I am not sure that I did, the Secretary of the Treasury already had authority to issue Panama Canal bonds to pay for this expenditure. If he had, I suppose he still has that authority, and if he has he can pay all the past expenditures made on account of the so-called Mexican situation out of the issue of Panama Canal bonds, and then he will have this fund for future operations in Mexico.

I do not know what to do about it. Of course, if the bill comes to a vote a majority will pass it in any language they have a mind to, and they seem to resent anybody asking for information or calling attention to the loose wording of the bill. But that shall not deter me from making such comments as I choose to make upon it from time to time, and I leave it there.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I only desire to call the attention of the Senate to what I consider a grossly inelegant, untechnical, unstatutory phrase which never has appeared, to my knowledge, in connection with financial legislation or bond issues. I challenge any precedent for the issuance of bonds for a " situation." It makes us ridiculous before the exchequers and treasuries of civilized nations to use such language. Certainly we ought to defer somewhat to the laws of grammar, to the elegancies of diction, to the phraseology which bankers and borrowers and creditors are accustomed to use. I have never heard of a customer going into a bank to float a note for a "situation," commendable as the situation might be, or to ask for a personal loan from an old friend upon the street for a "situation."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I call my colleague's attention to the fact that two months ago a very eminent lawyer testified that he was "attorney for the situation."

Mr. PENROSE. Yes. If we are going to use the vulgar parlance of the street in connection with fiscal phraseology, I would suggest the propriety of striking out the word "situation" and let it read "the Mexican mess." That would be a little more descriptive anyhow in its accuracy and equally technical. I have sufficient patriotism in my bringing up and in my education to want to preserve the high standards of statutory language, and I intend when the opportunity is offered and this paragraph again appears upon the floor of the Senate open to amendment to offer an amendment changing the phraseology of the Mexican "situation" or Mexican "mess" into more elegant and illuminating and definite and legal language, so that the vast army of citizens who will put the savings of their thrift into this $20,000,000 of expenditure may know a little more clearly for what purpose it has been spent or is being spent. They may well feel puzzled as to how it has been spent or how it will be spent, for up to the present time the Mexican mess or the Mexican "situation" has hardly advanced an inch. It is just the same as it was when the famous phrases of "watchful waiting" and "too proud to fight" were submitted to the patriotic consideration of the American people. We have been in and we have been out. I do not know whether we will go in and go out again or not, but certainly while we are committing these wanton acts let us observe the proprieties at least of appearance and clothe our performances in technical language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the psychological "situation" or "mess," whichever it may be, of the Senator from Pennsylvania is supreme, it is almost sublime, but with it all it is quite amusing. Everybody who listens to the Senator from Pennsylvania knows that he is distressed neither in mind nor body in the argument which he has just been making. He wants to strike out the word "situation" and wants to substitute for it the word "mess." He tells us that by his bringing up he is better prepared to vote for the word "mess" than for the word situation."

Now, what is the "situation" in Mexico? Let us be serious about it a while and talk about it earnestly, not merely in a partisan spirit, a spirit which concludes that any rack pin to hang a hat on to hurt the Democratic Party is a good rack pin.

What is the "situation"? Who knows what it is? How can we make a definite appropriation for a definite "situation"? Carranza has lately come out and given us notice that he stands among the three Americas-Central, South, and North America-in opposition to the President of the United States, and asking him to knuckle down quietly upon four fingers on the floor and submit to being kicked once more.

The universal opinion of the party to which the Senator from Pennsylvania belongs is that the President has been kicked enough already. If there is any criticism of him at all, it is not that he has not gone far enough, but that he ought to have gone further; not that he has not acted quickly enough, but that he ought to have acted more quickly. I am not agreeing with those criticisms, because they are your criticisms floating in the circumambient political atmosphere from Massachusetts clear on through wherever there is a Republican who is bent upon attacking the President of the United States.

Mr. President, it does not make any difference whether you call the Mexican "situation" the Mexican "mess"; it is a messed-up situation. There is no doubt about that. It is a mess because there was nothing that we could do that would have kept it from being an uncontrollable sort of a bad situation, unless we had been willing to put the American people in for a worse mess than the Mexican people were already in.

What are you going to do with those people? Suppose you stop "the watchful waiting." of which you make so much fun, and suppose that 35,000 American troops headed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Penrose] go down to reduce Mexico to order—perhaps the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Brandegee] acting as his lieutenant—what are you going to do with them?
Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield most gladly to hear the answer to

Mr. PENROSE. In all my criticism of the Mexican situation I never offered to go down there myself. I early became convinced that I exposed too much surface to the enemy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am the last man in the world to doubt the physical courage of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know he is just as brave as I am or anybody else. I did not mean to infer that he was not going with the idea of saving his own hide. Of course I knew he was not going. I knew that by my knowledge of myself and by my knowledge of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I knew neither one of us was going, but I also knew that a good many American boys would have to go if we are going to have that trouble. I also know that the Senator from Pennsylvania knows that there is no way of defining the Mexican The fingers of a great European power have already been playing with the Mexican pulse. We have already re-ceived from Carranza an intimation of what might happen. We have also received an intimation of the same great foreign nation playing with the pulse in Cuba. The Senator from Pennsylvania knows those facts as well as I do. He knows that if we make a provision for bonds to meet the Mexican situation, that situation must remain indefinite, because we can not define it. We can not define it because its definition remains with Mexico and with the European pulse finding and feeling power in Mexico.

Of course the Senator from Pennsylvania knows all that. There is no man in this body with better sense than he. ever else may have been said about him at any time or whatever else may be said about him now, his intellectual acumen is almost perfect. He knows the situation in Mexico as well as I do, and he knows that neither he nor I know that it is a definite situation and that it is "a mess," as he calls it, and that calling it "a mess" does not help "the situation."

The American people somehow or other right now have got to stand shoulder to shoulder against foreign aggression. It would not be becoming to be too specific in saying what that foreign aggression is, but the Senator knows it as well as I do. perhaps knows it better because he has a better individual intellect than I have.

Now, Mr. President, after you are through with it all, the Senator tells us that here is a bond put upon the market to meet "a situation"; that he never heard of anybody being economically armed with sufficient business penetration to subscribe for bonds "to meet a situation." What a man subscribes to is the bond and it is not the situation. Whenever the United States Government puts out a bond to meet its possible expenses for the purpose of meeting a situation announced to them, the United States therefore necessarily becomes sponsor. The situation is elastic; the bond is a definite thing.

Speaking for myself, and I think speaking for the Senator from Pennsylvania, if we had a few hundred dolle s to spend we would not have the slightest hesitation about the security. The Senator, of course, knows he has been playing with the galleries and has been playing with the public and has been playing with the Senate. He does not mean one word that he He knows as well as I do that the business value of that bond issued by the United States is not in the slightest degree embarrassed by the use of the word "situation."

By the way, the word situation is not a very indefinite word. It means the sitting place of the nation at that time as well as the nation can discover a sitting place. If the Senator knows what our situation in Mexico is he knows a lot more than I do. It is a thing apt to be developed in any minute to mean something totally unexpected. As Disraeli says, "It is the unexpected that always happens."

Now, why does the Senator from Pennsylvania come in here about once a month to break my pair in order to produce a case of discord and lack of harmony in the national defense?

Mr. PENROSE. I protected the Senator from Mississippi for nearly two weeks in January.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He did. There is no doubt about that, and he protected me most nobly. That does not discount the fact that I have protected him for about two years. But let

Why should he come here and try to create discord about nothing, about a word, a difference between "a situation" and a mess

By the way, I do not know what the word "mess" means. The word "mess," if anything at all, means a nasty situation and a bad situation, something worse than a sweet situation. The worse the situation is the more money we will need to meet The more unexpected the situation will be the more we will need to be prepared for it.

My friend from Pennsylvania is one of the most genial men who ever lived. He is all right in every respect except when his partisanship is aroused. It makes a man like me, who is really patriotic, sigh with grief when I view his partisanship. Whether it is some old Federalist doctrine or whether it is a new plutocratic doctrine makes no difference, the Senator from Pennsylvania is equally strenuous in his support of both. I remember only a few years ago when the Senator went back to Pennsylvania to be an uplifter, when he made up his mind that this modern party that calls itself "progressive" could not "outprogress" him upon any question in the world. But just as soon as he got himself safely seated in the Senate his progressivism and his upliftism expired by their mutual consent and by his consent, too.

I hope the Senator will not insist upon introducing the word "mess" upon an American statute in order to cure the internet mess of the word "situation," which he knows to express a real ness of the word "situation," and not merely an indefiniteness of

Mr. President, the time will come some day when the biographies of statesmen will be written, and the biography of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be written, too. I promise not to eulogize him during his lifetime for fear I might do him harm, but after he is dead, if he shall die before I do, I shall pronounce a eulogy upon him for some good for which he is entitled to be remembered. I do not want the Senator to present himself to the American people as offering an amendment to substitute the word "mess," which is very indefinite, if not of doubtful conword "mess," which is very indefinite, if not of doubtful construction, for the word "situation," which is about as definite as we can make it, especially when he remembers, as I remember, that the bond is for this specific thing, and he will be mighty glad to have a few of them if he has money enough to buy them.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President. I do not intend to pursue this matter any further. I am anxious to facilitate the passage of this measure and to help to perfect it. So far it is the fact that I have been completely ignored with my colleagues in the minority in our patriotic efforts to prune out some of the inconsistencies in the measure. I rose in good faith to call attention to the impropriety of the word "situation" in connection with a bond issue, and tried to accentuate my objections by saying the word "mess" might just as well have been used. When the paragraph appears in the Senate I shall offer proper technical language in connection with the issue of the bonds.

I know that the credit of the Government is the bond, but the knowledge of the purpose of the loan is a test of the popularity of the loan. If the loan is for a purpose offensive to the American people or unpopular among them, there will not be that ready contribution that there would be where universal approval is voiced for the bond issue from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. I can easily imagine how an aroused public sentiment perhaps might ridicule this performance of borrowing money for a "situation" so that men might well hesitate to subscribe with any great zeal, and the bonds, perchance, might not be floated upon as favorable conditions as might have prevailed had a little more decorum been preserved in issuing them. So I will not pursue the matter further at the present time.

As to the Mexican situation I shall say briefly that I am one of those who look on it as constituting the most deplorable chapters in the history of our foreign relations. infirmity of purpose, ignorance of conditions, and inexperience with the rules and amenities of international intercourse have brought us to a condition in Mexico where we incur nothing but contempt. Had the situation been taken up firmly in the beginning, upon the lines of definite and recognized diplomatic procedure, with the recognition of the de facto government in conjunction with the other nations of the world, we would not have had this condition. A few thousand men, had the necessity arisen, could have gone into Mexico then when the American citizen was respected and feared and American rights were respected and honored, just as they went 70 years ago under Scott and Taylor and marched into Mexico with five or eight thousand men and conquered the country. But having once sunk to the lowest level, as a people branded with cowardice, and with a Government prompted only by infirmity of purpose, 150,000 men on the border and far into the interior were unable to hunt to cover a bandit with a few hundred followers. It is a lamentable situation and it is a complicated one, but all the trouble has arisen from the ignorance and incapacity of those whose duty it was to have taken hold of the matter early and firmly, until the situation as described in this bill has cost several hundred million dollars and may cost several hundred million dollars more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing the amendment. Without objection, the amendment is to the amendment. agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, do I understand we are still on the bond question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was agreed to without objection.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Sheppard in the Chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OWEN. May I ask the indulgence of the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. Mr. OWEN. I wanted to ask if we might not agree that on Monday we might take the first hour after meeting to dispose of the amendments to the Federal reserve act? It is quite an important matter, and I have been trying for weeks to get it concluded. I do not think it will take over a half or threequarters of an hour.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator will not make that request in the absence of the chairman of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS. I see, however, that the Senator from North Carolina has come in.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if this is the bill that authorizes the member banks of the Federal Reserve System to charge exchange rates?

Mr. OWEN. The members of the system have a right to charge whatever rates they please, and they have always had it since the act passed. This bill does not deal with that,

Mr. SHERMAN. As it is now, though, if I understand correctly, the exchange is limited to the cost of transacting the exchange business.

Mr. OWEN. No; there is no statute about it. They are at liberty to charge what they please. They seem to have gotten the impression that this bill proposes to deal with the matter of exchange, and forbids them to charge exchange. The bill does not do that. The report has been printed and is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill, if I have read it correctly, would put it in the power of the Federal Reserve Board to authorize the national banks to charge a reasonable rate of exchange, and the board would fix the rate.

Mr. OWEN. I do not so interpret it. The report speaks for itself; but that matter could be considered if we could arrive at some agreement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am opposed to the bill in its present form,
Mr. President, and could not yield for that purpose, because it occurs to me-

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERMAN. For a question. Mr. WEEKS. I wanted to say that there are several features in this proposed legislation. One of them, at least, is as important as any matter with which the Senate has to deal. has to do with getting into the Federal reserve banks as much of the floating surplus gold as can be done within a reasonable time; and I hope an effort will be made to get action on this bill. There may be features of the bill which Senators will want to oppose, but I am confident that they will not oppose that particular proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHERMAN. For a question.
Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in the present situation, at this particular time, I can not consent to laying aside the revenue bill either to-day or to-morrow for the bill presented by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I suggested Monday, not to-day or to-morrow.
Mr. SIMMONS. A little later I may be able to consent to that; but I hope, for the present, that the Senator will not press that request.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw the request, under the circumstances.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator desire to lay the revenue bill aside?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; no such proposition as that is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will proceed with my comments, then. [Mr. SHERMAN resumed and concluded his speech on February 24.1

GEN. FUNSTON.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, the sudden and untimely death of Maj. Gen. Funston, who had served his country so bravely and brilliantly for many years, came as a great shock to the Nation. By his death Kansas lost the greatest soldier she ever produced.

It was my privilege to know Gen. Funston personally when I lived in Allen County, Kans., where he made his home from the time he was about 2 years old. After reaching manhood he was not at his old home much of the time, but I saw him occasionally when he returned on visits. One of my first official acts was to call the attention of President Wilson to this worthy officer of the Army and to the fact that justice demanded he be made a major general at the first opportunity; and it was indeed pleasing to me and to the people of Kansas when the President finally gave him his deserved recognition by advancing him to the high rank of major general November 18, 1914.

Gen. Funston's death is not only a great loss to Kansas but is a greater loss to the entire Nation. This is especially true at this particular time when military genius means so much to the Nation. Gen. Funston was a natural-born soldier. He was a military genius with no superiors and with few equals. never had military schooling or special military training, but the instincts of a soldier and the peculiar characteristics of a commanding officer were born in him. Without military train-ing he went to Cuba and cast his lot with that brave and courageous people who were fighting for liberty, and while thus engaged he attained distinction as an officer. After his last battle in which he was wounded, he was captured by the Spanish, and it was only by his quick natural wit that he was able to gain freedom, claiming to be an American newspaper reporter and in sympathy with the Spaniards. His achievements as an officer in the Cuban Army in over 20 battles favorably commended him to the Army of the United States. When the Spanish War began he was appointed colonel of the Twentieth Kansas Volunteer Infantry, and he made that regiment famous. His personally planned capture of Aguinaldo, the Philippine rebel chief, on March 23, 1901, which terminated the rebellion, was such as to give him prominence throughout the world for daring, courage, and successful execution of difficult military plans

With only four American officers and 78 native Macabebe scouts and three Spaniards, Gen. Funston undertook this difficult task by marching from Manila to Palanan, in the interior of Luzon, where Aguinaldo had his headquarters. general, with the other Americans, pretended to be prisoners of the Philippine scouts. Letters were sent to Aguinaldo purporting to come from Gen. Lacuna, who was associated with Aguinaldo in the rebellion against the United States, stating he was sending a number of fine troops for the personal use of the Philippine president, who had captured and made prisoners a number of American members of a surveying party, and also requested that Aguinaldo send them an escort and supplies. Aguinaldo complied with their request, and implored the Macabebes, who pretended to be rank insurgents, to treat the white prisoners kindly. As they approached the headquarters they were greeted by Aguinaldo personally, with a fine bodyguard of troops, who received them with great pomp and ceremony. The troops of Gen. Funston, by prearrangement, surrounded the headquarters and marched in front of Aguinaldo's troops. Aguinaldo retired to the house, and Gen. Funston immediately assumed command, and an order was given, "Now, Macabebes, go for them!" This command was followed by a brisk firing of guns and a general scattering of Aguinaldo's troops. Aguinaldo, hearing the shots and mistaking them for signs of festivities and being short of gunpowder, rushed to the window and shouted, "Stop that foolishness! Don't waste ammuni-tion!" He was immediately seized by one of the officers throwing his arms around him, and was then rushed to the coast and taken to Manila, which put an end to the rebellion. Gen. McArthur said of this victory at the time:

The transaction was brilliant in conception and faultless in execution.

President McKinley, in an autograph letter, wrote the following concerning Gen. Funston's regiment:

The American Nation appreciates the devotion and valor of its soldiers and sailors. Among its hosts of brave defenders, "the Twentieth Kansas" was fortunate in opportunity and heroic in action, and has won a permanent place in the hearts of a grateful people.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

On October 10, 1899, the Twentieth Kansas Regiment entered Golden Gate, San Francisco, on its return home, where it was greeted by the governor of Kansas and other distinguished Kansans and given a triumphant welcome all the way from San Francisco to the capital of Kansas. On November 3, 1899, a grand reception was tendered the members of the regiment by the people of Kansas at Topeka, where men, women, and children came in great crowds from all sections of the State to welcome and to honor the brave "Twentieth Kansas boys," who had accomplished so much for the Nation and added so many pages of glory to the history of the State. Gen. Funston was presented with a gold sword set in diamonds purchased by popular subscription.

Promotions came to Gen. Funston rapidly until he became brigadier general of the Army April 1, 1901, when his youth and the fact that he rose from the volunteer service interfered with his further advancement for over 13 years. Both President Roosevelt and President Taft promoted other Regular Army officers over him who were his senior in years but had performed no special distinguished service. Gen. Funston almost despaired of promotion, but with characteristic tenacity he stuck to the Army until he received his coveted reward. He accepted his fate philosophically and in good spirits, as is shown in a letter to me of October 17, 1914, in acknowledgment of his appreciation of my interest in his behalf, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES, Vera Cruz, Mexico, October 17, 1914.

counting my two years as a brigadler general of Volunteers. But what is the use of being unhappy about it? Really, I am lucky to be alive and to have such a good and beautiful wife and such adorable children. Under such treatment nine out of ten men would find it hard to be loyal and to do their duty, but somehow I do not. It will not make any and to do difference.

Again thanking you for your interest in me, I am,

FREDERICK FUNSTON.

As he advanced in rank in the Army, he immediately assumed and mastered all the higher responsibilities devolved upon him. He discharged with fidelity every trust and duty placed upon him in the most satisfactory manner. There was no military commander since the Civil War whose fighting qualities and brave exploits so endeared him to the people as the little hero who fought with Gomez and Garcia for 18 months as commander of the Cuban artillery, and with the Twentieth Kansas Volunteers against the Spaniards and ladrones in the Philippines, While his dashing and picturesque capture of Aguinaldo gave Gen. Funston his greatest prominence, and made him a brigadier general, yet he performed services to his country far more difficult and of much greater value.

When San Francisco was falling into charred ruins and its terrified inhabitants fled to the hills in disorder and uncontrolled lawlessness prevailed, it was Gen. Funston at the head of the Regulars who brought order out of chaos. He met every requirement of that awful situation and won the confidence and esteem of not only the citizens of California but of the entire Nation, who all greatly sympathized with the people of that unfortunate city.

He played well his part in the Vera Cruz campaign, and has received praise from everywhere for his successful management of military affairs on the Mexican border. The American troops had only been in Vera Cruz a short time when a Mexican general sent him a message stating that he was unable to longer restrain his troops which were about to advance and drive the Americans into the sea. Gen. Funston sent back one of his characteristic replies, saying, "If you can not hold your troops back, I can." This was in line with his famous reply to Gen. Otis when he asked him, "How long can you hold your position, Funston?" and he replied, "Until my regiment is mustered out."

Concerning his death, and services in Mexico, the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, made this statement:

Of War, Mr. Baker, made this statement:

Gen. Funston's death is a loss to the Army and a loss to the country. During the trouble on the Mexican border his work has been difficult, exacting, and delicate. His conduct has been that of a soldier, and he has exemplified the high tradition of the American Army by his quick, intelligent, and effective action. Throughout it all the sympathy between Gen. Funston and the department has been complete and no shadow of disagreement has arisen.

Gen. Funston's life was a career of continual adventure and reads like a novel, and is one that appeals to every patriotic young man of the country.

While still a student at the Kansas University he went on an exploring expedition to Colorado in places in the Rocky Mountains which were difficult of access, and worked as guide to earn money to pay his expenses. A few years later his father, Hon. E. H. Funston, who was a Member of Congress from the second Kansas congressional district from 1884 to 1894, secured his appointment as a botanist to accompany a party of Government surveyors to explore Death Valley, where he spent seven months. He next went on a daring adventure to Alaska, and on his return trip went down the Yukon River in a small canoe which he built himself and made the perilous trip of over 1,500 miles down the river alone. As he neared the end of his journey the boat capsized and he struggled for his life in the icy water. He succeeded in saving himself only to be threatened with death from cold and starvation, but fortunately came across a missionary post where he took refuge, but be became sick and nearly died from pneumonia.

While in Cuba, leading a cavalry charge, he was wounded in both lungs, his horse was shot from under him, falling upon and crushing his right leg, and while he was endeavoring to crawl to the Cubans he was captured by the Spaniards, making a hairbreadth escape. His skill and daring at Rio Grande de la Pampanga, Luzon, for which he was awarded a medal of honor; his bravery, exemplified by the execution of his plan for the capture of Aguinaldo; his executive power in peace, shown as department commander in San Francisco, Portland, Denver, St. Louis, Chicago, and Manila, and his long experience as a commanding general, and particularly his recent valuable services rendered at Vera Cruz and on the Mexican border, all mark

Dear Senator Thompson: I can not tell you how much I appreciate your action in writing the President and Secretary of War in my behalf, I being especially grateful for what you did because it was an entirely voluntary act.

I hear that I am again to be passed over in the matter of promotion. I suppose that my principal crime is still my "youth." God save the mark. I used to be young, but have been getting over it at the rate of 365 days per year. I have marked time for 18 long years, not still survives him, and whom he visited at the old home on every possible occasion. He was a lover of children and music, and it is an interesting coincidence that he was playing with a little child and listening to the hotel orchestra playing The Blue Danube waltz, of which he had just remarked "How beautiful it is," when the death summons suddenly came.

After his mastery of the Vera Cruz and border situation it was not difficult to conceive a second "Chapultepec" of Mexico as peaceful as the campaigns in the Philippines, and I have often thought that had Gen. Funston been given a free hand at the border and placed personally in charge of an expedition into Mexico he could have returned with Gen. Villa to answer to this country for the murders which he and his men had committed in the Columbus massacre. He knew no fear. He was venturesome and resourceful beyond measure. While, like Napoleon, he was only a small man in stature, barely 5 feet 5 inches in height, yet he was a great fighter and may well be called the "little hero of Manila and Mexico." His great achievements prove him one of the most skillful, hard-working, and successful soldiers of our country, and he has brought to Kansas a fame unsurpassed by any of her greatest sons. He wore the uniform of the United States with the greatest honor and distinction, and at the age of only 51 he died, the youngest of our major generals. In the present impending crisis it will be difficult to fill his place. Kansas and the Nation sadly mourn their great

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes.

Mr. PAGE obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained in committee on work of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me for a minute?

Mr. PAGE. I have been asked by the Senator from Illinois

[Mr. Lewis] to yield to him for a moment. Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire, Mr. President, I desire, with the Senator's consent, appreciating his courtesy, to submit an amendment to the pending bill. I ask to have the amendment read and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read? Would it not be agreeable to him to have the amendment printed in the RECORD?

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator thinks it will take too much time to have the amendment read, I shall be glad to adopt his suggestion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would be better to have the amendment printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. LEWIS. As I do not wish to consume time unnecessarily I shall be glad to avail myself of the Senator's suggestion. It is an amendment conferring power upon the President of the United States to seize foodstuffs held in violation of public policy. I ask, then, that the amendment be printed in the Record. I thank the Senator from Vermont for yielding to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Lewis to the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes, viz: Insert the following:

"SEC. —. That whenever to the knowledge or information of the President of the United States there are circumstances sufficient to justify him, in his judgment, to proclaim that the food and necessities of life of the citizen of the United States is being monopolized and wrongfully held by persons in the United States for the purpose of unjust increase in price, and whenever such increase of price, to the judgment of the President of the United States, upon facts to his knowledge, is in pursuance of the violation of existing laws of the United States forbidding monopolize and conspiracies to monopolize the necessities of life, the President of the United States may, by proclamation, proclaim the fact so established. That then and there, in any court of the United States, process may be filed by any United States attorney for the seizure of such foods as held in violation of law and which are necessary to the maintenance and life of a citizen of the United States.

"SEC. —. That such seizures provided for in section 1 of this act may be made by any efficer of the law of the United States or by any officer of any State who may be authorized to serve as an officer of the United States in conjunction with any officer of the United States or by authority or order of the President of the United States through Executive order.

thority or order of the President of the United States through Executive order.

"Szc. — That the said foods, when seized, may be at once disposed of at public sale in such manner as shall be judged as proper by the officers of the law to whom judgment in condemnation is now authorized by law in matters of condemnation now provided for the United States Government, the goods so condemned to be disposed of to those whose necessities are first to be relieved. The price to be obtained from such products shall be no higher than such rates as shall be prescribed by such department of the Federal Government as may be designated at the time of the President's proclamation by the President of the United States. Said sale shall be in a public place and upon limit in such quantity to each purchaser as shall be prescribed as a minimum to the due and proper necessity of those whose necessities are the object of this act.

"Szc. — That when any goods or foods are so selzed same shall be paid for by the United States upon the basis of the fair market value; that whenever the said market value is declined said goods or foods shall be the subject of condemnation, and the fair market value arrived at by the said condemnation proceedings submitted to a jury in such courts as have jurisdiction in condemnation proceedings at the instance of the United States; that the seizures herein prescribed may be had peremptorily; that the sales and disposition to those whose necessities justify shall be had promptly, without delay, to the object of preventing a monopoly of foods inflicting upon the citizens the penalty of hunger and the vicissitudes of need.

"Sec. — That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, would the Senator from Vermont be willing to permit the next amendment to be read before he proceeds? I have an amendment that I want to offer, and I would like to discuss it briefly. Would it discommode the Senator to defer his remarks until the conclusion of that?

Mr. PAGE. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator. The Secretary. The next amendment of the committee is on

The Secretary. On page 11, after line 4, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

The Secretarry. On page 11, after line 4, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

Sec. 401. That the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion is hereby authorized to berrow on the credit of the United States a sum not exceeding $63,945,460 and to prepare and issue therefor bonds of the United States, the proceeds of such bonds to be applied to the redemption on August 1, 1918, of the bonds of the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918 authorized by the act approved June 13, 1898, and then maturing, such proceeds to be applied to no other purpose: Provided, That in his discretion the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury prior to August 1, 1918, any of the bends of the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918 maturing on such date and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of bonds of the United States herein authorized: Provided further, That the bends herein authorized shall be in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, redeemable and payable at such times within 50 years from date of issue as the Secretary may direct, bearing interest payable quarterly at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, and the bonds herein authorized shall be payable, principal and interest, in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and both principal and interest shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and said bonds shall not be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks: Provided further, That said bonds may be disposed of by sale or exchange by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, and in case of sale all citizens of the United States shall be given an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor, but no commissions shall be allowed or paid thereon, and a sum not exceeding one-fifth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, at the end of the amendment, to insert the following:

Provided further, That in lieu of any of the bonds provided for in this act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to issue serial bonds of the United States, maturing in equal amounts from 1 year from date of issue to 25 years from date of issue at a rate of interest not exceeding one-fourth of 1 per cent in excess of the rates provided for in this act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to explain the amendment briefly, and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from North Carolina particularly.

This amendment in substance, gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to issue serial bonds instead of the bonds provided for in this act. I listened with a great deal of interest the other day to the address of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks] on this subject, and I am satisfied that all of those who listened to that address on the question of a comparison of serial bonds with the bonds provided for in this act were impressed with the idea that a great deal of money could be saved by issuing serial bonds, even though the rate of interest were higher.

I have provided in the amendment that if the Secretary issues serial bonds he can increase the rate of interest one-quarter of 1 per cent. I have made it discretionary with the Secretary whether he shall issue such bonds or the bonds provided for in the act as it stands at present.

Taking the figures given me by the Senator from North Carolina as to the amount of bonds provided for in this act, and making a rough computation at my desk here in the last few minutes, I have found that if the Secretary availed himself of the right given him here in this amendment, and it was necessary for him to increase the rate of interest one-quarter of 1 per cent, and then issue serial bonds instead of those provided for in the act, he would save in interest the sum of $279,000,-That saving would be spread out over 50 years of time; but, Mr. President, if we can save that much money, it seems to me that, even though it takes 50 years to save it, we ought to avail ourselves of the opportunity.

There is another point in it. If we issue the bonds that are provided for in this bill they will be like bonds that have been issued in the past; no provision will be made for their payment. They will mature, and we probably will be issuing re-funding bonds instead of paying them off at the expiration of the time they are to run. If serial bonds are issued, however, one twenty-fifth of them will be paid off each year, and at the end of 25 years they will all be paid, with a saving of more than the face of the bonds in the end. If you will compute the matter just briefly with a pencil you will find that we are paying more in interest than the principal of the bonds will amount to, and at the end of the 50 years the principal will still remain to be paid. If we provide for a sinking fund, as was so well demonstrated by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, even though we invest the sinking fund, there is always danger of that large amount of money being misappropriated, mis-handled, or honestly lost. If it is not invested, we have kept it out of circulation; and there would have to be somewhere in the neighborhood of $300,000,000, in round numbers, in the sinking fund to pay these bonds at the time they matured.

I earnestly hope that the Senator from North Carolina will not object to this amendment. I have not made it compulsory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds of this kind. The Government of the United States, as I understand, has never issued bonds of this kind. The Secretary never has been authorized to issue bonds of this kind. It is the modern method resorted to now by most of the municipalities issuing bonds at the present time; and it seems to me there could be no possible objection to at least giving to the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion of issuing these bonds instead of the others provided for.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in behalf of the committee, I am inclined to make no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. The VICE PRESIDENT.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I doubt if there is any State in this Union that is so vitally affected by the so-called Underwood amendment as the State of Vermont. I dislike to take the time of the Senate in discussing a proposition which has been already so well discussed by the Senate; but it seems to me that the duty is incumbent upon me to say a few words, because the State I in part represent is so vitally interested.

Something like 30 years ago the agricultural interests of Vermont were very materially depressed. Our farms were selling for a very low price. Our boys, as they became young men, thought they saw, and they probably did see, in the West a greater opportunity for success; and they left the farms where they had been brought and work off to help brilly where they had been brought up and went off to help build up the other States. Even to-day Vermont suffers immensely because of this tendency of our young men; and when I say "our young men" I may specify, perhaps, by saying that it is the more progressive and enterprising of our young men who go away from the State. The last census shows that we have 407,000 natives of Vermont in this country, and yet, sir, only 250,000 of them live within the borders of the State.

The result was that our farms reached a very unfortunate condition as to the quality of the land. The quality of the soil was depreciating from year to year. Our sleep industry, which in the early seventies and eighties was a most important industry, had gone backward until in 1890 we had very little of that industry left in our State. We formerly raised some wheat. We raised a goodly amount of cereals. We raised a good many hops. But along in the latter part of the nineteenth century, say about 1890, our farmers became more interested in dairying, and from that time until the present our State has been improving, our farmers have been more prosperous, our young men in larger numbers are staying at home, and to-day the dairying interest is the one great industry of our

Perhaps I ought to qualify that statement. It is true that we produce more than 50 per cent more marble than all the other States of the Union combined; and, barring Pennsylvania, which is the great slate State, we produce more slate than all the rest of the Union. In 1907 we stood third, I think, among the granite-producing States; in 1909 we were second; in 1911 we were first. I think I am right about these dates. It is not material about the exact years; but from 1912 forward we have been the great granite State of the Union, producing by far more granite than any other State, and of quality. We produce more scales than any other State, and do not know but that we produce more than all the other States of the Union. As I came down from my home last month I picked up one of the menus in the dining car, and there I found this sentence:

Vermont produces more maple sugar than all the rest of the Union combined.

With all of these industries standing out so prominently, perhaps I ought not to say that the dairying industry is the one great, leading industry of our State; and yet that comes very near being the truth, because our farmers to-day are devoting their energies largely to the dairy and to poultry.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood], in his debate upon the butter industry, told us the other day that butter was made without any Federal inspection. I do not know but he is right about that; but he might have said that the butter industry of Vermont, of Maine, and, I think, of most of the other States, is inspected very, very closely; and to-day there is no industry that in my judgment is conducted with greater reference to purity and to health than the butter industry.

As I said in my remarks the other day, our farmers take their milk in the early morning and put it in closed containers, cans that are absolutely clean and that are thoroughly scalded every day in order that there may be nothing septic about them. It is then taken to the creameries; and I want to say to any Senator here that if he wishes to see the best possible evidence of cleanliness and of purity he may go to our Vermont creameries, and he will there find it.

Mr. President, it seems to me that a gross wrong is done to my State when a Senator will stand up and say that the butter product of the country is 61 per cent impure. I do not know product of the country is 61 per cent impure. where the figures come from. I remember that they were taken several years ago; but any one who is conversant with the butter industry knows that such a statement is an absolute insult to the intelligence of the people. The people of the dairying States know that it can not be true, I care not where the statement comes from.

I want to read, if I may be permitted, the statement made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] in which he speaks of the unwholesomeness of our butter product. I thought I had it before me so that I could turn to it in a moment, but I do not seem to find it. I know he made charges against this great industry that ought not to have been made in the United States

Mr. President, I wish to follow a little further the conditions in my own State. In 1890 we began to improve upon the methods of butter making. We began to improve the breeds of our cattle. The old native cow, with very few exceptions, is no longer found in Vermont. We have some known as "grades," but the great majority of our farmers to-day have the Jersey, the Guernsey, the Ayrshire, and a few of the Holsteins. I want to say that Vermont expends annually each year thousands upon thousands of dollars to eradicate tuberculosis. To-day, as was well said by my colleague yesterday, we regard any farmer who will permit tubercular cattle in his herd as almost a public enemy. We have great pride in our dairying industry; a public enemy. We have great pride in our dairying industry; and any one who wishes to ascertain this truth has only to go to Vermont to see that every effort that can possibly be made is made to give Vermont a pure dairy product.

The same is true in regard to our sugar. A few years ago it was the custom rather than otherwise for a farmer to mix granulated sugar with his maple product. But the State has taken it upon itself to remedy this matter, and to-day there is a heavy fine imposed upon any man who adulterates his maple The fact is, Mr. President, we have learned that to be successful in any business we must do that business well, and we are doing it well in sugar, in poultry, and in butter. Turn to your menus, and you will find that they are very apt to feature the Vermont turkey. We produce the best of their kind in all these lines.

Now, what has been the result? Every good farmer understands-and I see there are some farmers here-that if you do not take back to the soil the ingredients taken from it you will deplete that soil.

The State of Massachusetts to-day is suffering because its milk is sold to go to the cities—to Boston, to Worcester, to Providence, and to other large cities. That milk goes out of the State and nothing comes back from it, and the result is a deterioration of the soil. I fear that within a short time Vermont is likely to suffer in the same way, because we are now sending some-and I fear increasing quantities-of our milk to New York and other cities. But where the milk is taken to the creamery, the cream extracted, and the milk sent back to the farm and fed to the hogs the result is that we improve from year to year the quality of our soils. If those of you who have not been through the State of Vermont during the past 30 years would ride through our State to-day, you would hardly know it, so materially has it been improved.

We might go further and say the same as to our highways. Vermont to-day has perhaps the best highways, or among the very best, of the Union, and those highways, I want to say further, are paid for. Vermont has no bonded debt. We do not build roads and bond our State to pay for them. Every year the State pays its bills as it goes along, and the only debt we owe, I believe, is a few thousand dollars taken by the State from the school fund, and upon which the State returns 6 per cent interest each year.

This dairy interest has built up Vermont, and I have no doubt it has built up other dairying States as it has Vermont, and we feel, and I think we feel rightfully, that any public legislation that makes a direct attack upon this the greatest industry of our State is but little less than criminal. Vermont will take its medicine. Make all the oleomargarine you please, make it as good as you please, sell it where and when you please, but sell it for what it is.

I read in the Senate the other day the ingredients of oleomargarine. I want to read them again because I want you to see the kind of competition that we are up against. I do not know that this book entitled "Food Inspection and Analysis" is a standard work, but I sent to the Congressional Library and got it, believing it to be such, and in the book I find this

The composition of oleomargarine varies between the following

Oleo oil, 20 to 25 per cent. Neutral lard, 40 to 45 per cent.

Mr. President, consider for a moment what it means to pass the legislation provided for in the Underwood amendment. It means that you take from the hog from 40 to 45 per cent of the entire ingredients which go into oleomargarine. of tallow, which is by a process made into oleo oil, 20 to 25 per cent. How do you suppose the dairying industry can be successfully carried on if it must compete with an article made of these cheap ingredients and sold fraudulently as butter? Let me state for the edification of the Senate that the other ingredients are butter, 10 to 25 per cent, and milk, 5 to 30 per cent. What is butter mixed with these other ingredients for? For any honest purpose? Everyone understands that it is solely that that margarine when it is produced may look and taste like and have the flavor of butter. It is churned in milk. Why? Because by churning it in milk they get from the milk a little of the yellow color which gives to the oleomargarine a little nearer approach to butter.

There is no need of debating this question of fraud, whole purpose of this measure is to permit a fraudulent article to be sold in competition with a legitimate industry. That is all there is to it. We talk about it as being put up in marked packages so that the purchaser may understand what he is buying. That amounts to absolutely nothing. The facts are that when the butter is placed before the guests of the hotel, the boarding house, and the restaurant it bears no marks indicating that it is not butter.

cating that it is not butter.

The State of New York by law provides that in all its hotels, its boarding houses, and its restaurants where oleomargarine is offered to the consumer as butter a placard stating that fact shall be plainly posted in the dining hall where it is so offered.

The suggestion that by being placed in packages, the package being marked "Oleomargarine," fraud is thereby prevented, is all wrong. If it would serve that purpose I would not object. I do not mean to confess that oleomargarine, made as it is, largely of lard and tallow, is the equivalent of butter, but if anybody wants to use oleo, I certainly do not object. I do object to having it sold as butter and in that way reducing the price of butter by this unfair, dishonorable, and unjust competition.

I think it was the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] who said that no one was opposing this measure except the Butter Trust, and that the opposition was coming from the Butter Trust. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Thompson] recently placed in the Record several telegrams he had received from different States of the Union. I remember there was one from my own State. There was not a single instance in which the butter makers of those States did not protest against the unfair competition which would result from this fraud. I remember that, in the case of my own State, the Holstein-Fresian Association of America, representing 100,000 owners and breeders of dairy cattle, entered its vigorous pro-test, asserting that it would work irreparable injury to the dairy interest. I fear there are good grounds for the fears expressed by this great association.

I understand that my good friend from Wyoming [Mr. WAR-REN] says that if he thought this measure would injure the dairy interests he would not press it. On whose judgment, I would ask the Senator in all candor, may we the more safely rely touching the effect of this legislation upon the welfare of the great dairy interest of the country? Should we rely on the views of those who are vitally interested in dairying or those whose interests are largely-perhaps exclusively-bound up in the beef industry?

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator intend to indict me as being interested in the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. PAGE. No; farthest from that. I only say you were kind enough to say if you thought this proposed legislation would injure the butter industry you would not support it. That is the language of your speech, as I read it.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly. I may be quite satisfied with my own judgment about this matter, as is the Senator with his judgment. I suppose I have been more continuously and longer engaged in butter making in some extent than almost any of the great butter makers of Vermont, both as to the number of years and the quantity, though they live to be somewhat older up there than I am; and I have seen something of the operation.

I know, as the Senator does, how unpopular it is to tackle a prejudice, especially among the rural people, of whom I have been one a great part of my life. I believe exactly as I said, that under the present law where a quarter of 1 cent per pound is taken upon white oleomargarine and where there is a fine or tax of 10 cents upon colored, it allows those wretched manipulators, who are neither farmers nor straight business men, to operate in taking the same kind of coloring that they put in butter and undertaking to imitate and sell it as butter.

I believe it would be better to mark on oleomargarine just what it is, and tax it accordingly and sell it for what it is, putting it in small packages duly marked so that it would be impossible to have it go to retailers and consumers except under its own name and brand.

Mr. PAGE. I thank the Senator for his statement.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he calls a 10-pound package a small package?

Mr. WARREN. Those matters could be very easily reached by an amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, myself, or others, and it may be done.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator if, in all fairness, we ought not to let the butter men, the men who are vitally interested in this matter, the men who get up at 4 o'clock in the morning to milk cows, say what ought to be done rather than those whose interests are opposed to them?

Mr. WARREN. I go the Senator one better, for I spent three years in getting up at 3 o'clock in the morning and milking as many cows, I presume, as he ever did; and I have been confined to the house making butter and cheese for months at a time in the State of Massachusetts, which, I am proud to say, lies very near the rugged State of Vermont. As to dairymen, Vermont is not the only dairy State in the Union. We had the very able remarks of an honored Senator here [Mr. Wassworth] from the great Empire State of New York, the richest State in the Union and the greatest dairy State. He takes the ground that it is a benefit, and would be in the long run, rather than a damage to those interests, to adopt the amendment now before us. He is a Senator, as the Senator from Vermont knows, who has had a good deal of experience in the cow business.

Mr. PAGE. I want to say to the Senator that in the State of New York there is a special law, as I have remarked, that no hotel keeper, no boarding-house keeper, can use oleomargarineat least, it can not be placed upon the table—unless there is a placard plainly marked saying that the boarding house or hotel uses oleomargarine for butter. If we could bring in some way to the attention of the men who eat the butter at the hotel and eat it at the boarding house and eat it on the railroad cars the fact that they are eating oleomargarine, we would destroy all the energy that is being put into this measure in the aid of Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator as to the language used. Does the placard state "Oleomargarine used in place of butter"?

Mr. PAGE. I only heard the Senator from New York in a single sentence speak of that, and I got the idea rather than the language. I am sorry I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. The only place I ever saw the notice, and I think that was out West, it did not say "in place of butter." That would have been a warning; but it said "Oleomargarine You were offered your choice of butter or oleomargarine. Of course you ordered butter and you were left to guess what you got. It was so with the dealer down here on the street the Senator's colleague spoke of yesterday. place pretended to have butter and oleomargarine, and, of course, the customer always got, from the dealer's standpoint, butter: the oleomargarine sign simply served to pacify the law, and the fraud went on. The trouble is we are trying here to reverse and avoid the truthfulness of the old saying that it is useless to lock the stable after the horse is stolen; and we let this article go out in imitation of butter and neglect what should be done, which is to prohibit the making of the article in imitation of butter.

Mr. PAGE. I agree with the Senator fully. Let me illustrate. For years you have been taking the wheat at the flour mills at Minneapolis and working out everything so as to make that Is not that correct? flour white.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir. Mr. PAGE. We try to make flour white, and we try to make bread white. In Vermont, at considerable expense and trouble, we try to make our maple sugar white. White is the color that most people prefer in much of their food. But in margarine, instead of allowing its natural color, white, to dominate, the margarine manufacturers are seeking all manner of subterfuges to give it the yellow color. Is this for any honest purpose? It is simply to defraud the people by selling oleomargarine for butter.

Mr. President, I am interested, and I have been interested very much in times past, in hearing what the Senator from Wyoming has said in regard to his early life on the farm. I want to say to the Senator that the man who runs a dairy earns

To be a good dairy farmer requires a great deal of energy, a great deal of hard work; and it is an industry that is entitled to be sustained, encouraged, and supported by Congress rather than to be made to suffer by legislation which can not be otherwise than detrimental.

I think I should refer for a moment to what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] said in regard to the facts in this case, as he thought them to be; and that was that but for the Butter Trust there would be no energy manifested here in opposition to this bill. Mr. President, if it were not for the Swifts and the Armours and the Cudahys, who are making money by the hundreds of millions every year, we should not find very much energy, in my judgment, put into the effort to secure the passage of this measure.

I remember that only a very few years ago the Swifts had a capitalization of but $25,000,000. The capital stock was worth from 100 to 102. A little later, however, that capitalization was increased to $50,000,000, while to-day it is, I believe, $75,000,000, and the price of the stock has gone up and up, until, I think, today it is quoted around 150.

I have not observed the quotations of late, but it must be somewhere in that vicinity. They are piling up millions of dollars absolutely beyond the dreams of avarice, and now they come here and ask to have this measure passed, that they may further add to their untold millions.

Mr. CLAPP. Would the Senator describe the moral attitude of an honest man who is pushing a manifestly dishonest measure? It just occurred to me that it is a sort of an anomalous situation that is presented here.

Mr. PAGE. I certainly do not want to accuse my brother Senators of being actuated by any but the most honorable motives. I simply say what we all know—it does not require argument to prove it—that it is the Armours and the Cudahys and the Swifts who make oleomargarine and who are making money by the millions by doing so. They are selling eleomargarine to-day for around 20 or 22 cents a pound. If this legislation prevails, they will, in my judgment, sell it for 25 cents a pound, and I do not know but for more. Still, this bill is being urged because it is claimed that it is going to be in the interest of the poor man.

Mr. President, I predict that within a year from the time this amendment is adopted—if it is adopted; I do not believe it will be-you will see the poor man paying from 2 to 5 and, perhaps, 10 cents higher for his oleomargarine than he is paying to-day.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, when I interrupted the Senator from Vermont, it was not with reference to Senators. The Senator from Vermont, as I understood him, was talking about the Swifts and the Armours who were manufacturing this product; and I had reference to men who put out a product which they must know in the very manufacture of it was intended to be an imitation.

Mr. PAGE. I understood what the Senator from Minnesota meant. I desire to say in regard to this whole matter that its influence is going to be very much wider than appears upon the surface here. We are to-day producing thousands upon thousands of calves in the dairy sections, and in that way are giving the country its beef; whereas if you destroy the dairy interests you at the same time very materially injure the beef industry. There is no question about this. It is not a matter that is narrowed down to the profit and loss of Armour and Swift on the one side or the dairying interests on the other; it is something that affects the whole country, and it affects it seriously and materially.

I observed in the pamphlet placed upon the desk of Senatorsthe pamphlet issued by the cottonseed-oil industry of the South, and by the beef industry-that some one is charged with materially overestimating the number of men engaged in dairying. The number given in the estimate of some one friendly to the dairy industry was, I think, some four and one-half millions. I do not remember the exact figures, perhaps some Senator can tell me. I think Senator Underwood placed the number at about one and one-half millions. Anyone conversant with the dairy industry of this country understands that it is impossible that it should be conducted by as few as one and one-half or even two million people. The men who own the farms may not number more than one and one-half million, but the men who work on the farms and who are connected with the industry swell that number three or fourfold. I do not know but we might properly count the mothers and daughters who in many cases contribute to the work of this industry, but the number who do this is small, as compared with 25 years ago. I can remember when nearly all the milk was converted into either butter or cheese in the homes; but to-day the instances are rare where either butter or cheese is made except in the creameries and cheese factories.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that if the estimated number of farmers is too large and the number is really smaller than the estimate, does it not furnish an additional reason why we ought to encourage rather than discourage the farming interests and industry?

Mr. PAGE. That would certainly seem to be fair; but the advocates of this measure are trying to minimize the importance of the industry, while the Senator from Alabama has literally filled several pages of the Congressional Record with the names of labor organizations that favor his measure.

Mr. CLAPP. No; but the question of numbers favoring or opposing a measure might have some effect upon the psychology of the situation. What I was getting at, however, was that the foundation of a nation's wealth and stability depends largely upon the agricultural development of the country; and aside from any question of numbers with reference to favoring or being opposed to this measure, if we have got our number of farmers estimated too largely, it is a deplorable fact; and, instead of being a reason for discouraging farming, it ought to be a reason for encouraging it.

Mr. PAGE. I agree with the Senator; but it seems to me that in this debate we are getting away from the fundamental principles which ought to govern us, namely, that a legitimate industry is sought to be ruined by legalizing a fraud. If that is true, who can stand up and defend this amendment? If it is not true, I want to be shown wherein.

I have yet to find any candid man who will say that he believes that, if this bill passes, we shall not see, all through the country, in every boarding house, in every hotel, in every restaurant, on every railroad train, oleomargarine placed upon the table as butter.

If any industry can not live in this country except by the practice of fraud, I think it ought to die. I do not believe we should permit the great beef monopolies of Chicago to take lard, tallow, and cottonseed oil and doctor them with a mixture of butter and palm them off upon the consuming public for what they are not. That, it seems to me, is really the crucial test which should be applied in every man's mind when he comes to decide upon this bill. Is it an honest measure? Is it designed to treat fairly a legitimate industry? If it does not, if the oleomargarine industry seeks to gain its prestige and its advantage by dishonesty, by selling its product to be used for what it is not, then, Mr. President, it seems to me, by all means, that we ought to defeat any legislation tending to encourage such a scheme.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose at this time to discuss the oleomargarine amendment, but I desire to submit a few remarks on the bill itself. Later on I may say a few words on that amendment and also on one other amendment.

The revenue bill now before the Senate, being House bill 20573, proposes to tax corporations at the rate of 8 per cent of the amount of net income left after deducting $5,000, plus 8 per cent of the actual capital invested. The net income for the purpose of this tax is to be the net income shown by the income-tax returns. I call particular attention to the words "the net income shown by the income-tax returns," for this definition of net income is one of the great iniquities of the bill, and I shall refer to it again later.

First, let us see how many corporations will be subject to this tax: (1) The law expressly exempts those corporations which are now expressly exempt from the income tax. As these exempt corporations are ones which are created for the public good or cooperative purposes and not for profit to the stockholders they may be dismissed without further consideration. (2) Income derived from the business of life, health, and accident insurance combined in one policy issued on the weekly premium plan is exempted in the House bill, but included in the bill reported to the Senate. (3) Every corporation having a net income of only $5,000 or less will escape the tax. In 1912, the last year of the corporation tax, 305,336 corporations filed returns, and of this number 61,116 had an income of more than If the same proportion is maintained for the last fiscal year of the Government-July 1, 1915, to June 30, 1916-of the 350,000 corporations, approximately, that filed returns approximately 70,000 will be shown to have $5,000 or more of net income. From this number we must deduct those corporations which do not earn more than 8 per cent on their capital, many railroads, public utilities, and other corporations, perhaps 20,000 in all. The tax will therefore fall on about 50,000 corporations, a small minority of those doing business, creating only a small part of the annual income of the country. Many of these taxable corporations will have small amounts of income exceeding the 8 per cent allowed as deduction. As the margin over 8 per cent increases, the number of corporations will decrease, so that it is probable that of the $170,000,000 expected to be raised by this tax 30,000 corporations will pay one half and the remaining 20,000 corporations the other half.

Partnerships and corporations, which are also made subject to this tax, are exempt on income derived from personal service. No end of difficulty will be experienced in defining for practical purposes the loose expression "personal service." I think this was thoroughly demonstrated in the discussion here last night, when Senators on the other side and Senators on this side were really unable to agree as to whom this tax would apply, and it is not now settled in the mind of any Senator, in my judgment, just whom this tax will reach.

The method of fixing the amount of capital by which the 8 per cent deduction is to be measured is open to grave criticism. Actual capital invested is defined by the law to be (1) the actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of assets other than cash at the time such assets were transferred, and (3) paidin or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business, but not to include borrowed money or property.

The actual cash paid in may perhaps be ascertained without difficulty, but how is the actual value of assets for which stock has been issued to be determined? Patent rights, mines, plants, and going businesses are often taken over at a valuation which, in the judgment of the directors, justifies the issue of stock. Good will, that most intangible of assets, often forms the basis for the issue of stock, as do also prospective earnings under efficient management. A more difficult thing to determine than the actual cash value of these assets could hardly have been required. It will cause endless controversy between the tax-

"Paid-in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business" presents another problem. What is a corporation to do whose assets have increased in value for 20 years, but which increase has not been taken up on the books? Even if it has been taken up and credited to surplus account, is it to be considered as "capital invested," in view of the phrase "paid-in or earned" surplus, used in the law? Apparently surplus is not to be taken into account if it arises from an increase in value of assets. It seems also that the law will not permit consideration of surplus or undivided profits, unless used in the business, to be considered in determining the 8 per cent deduction, for it employs the term "used or employed in the business." Hence the income from surplus and undivided profits invested in securities must be included in the amount of excess profits" to be taxed, but the 8 per cent deduction must be based on capital exclusive of such surplus.

A tax fraught with more difficulties of administration and more puzzling problems to the taxpayer is hard to conceive. The burden of the tax is excessive, its incidence falls on too small a proportion of the taxpayers, and, as if to add insult to injury, its method of computation is so difficult that the tax-payer will be compelled to incur much added expense in time and expert assistance in order to determine how much or how little he must pay.

The present income-tax law is far from perfect after a period of development of over three years. Its administration is trusted to a department which is undermanned and overburdened and is unable to give the time and attention necessary to work out the details of administration. Rulings under the amended law of September 8, 1916, for the guidance of taxpayers have not yet appeared, although they should in due course have been published before the beginning of the present year. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his last annual report repeatedly calls attention to the fact that the department is undermanned. Because of a lack of sufficient force of clerks, the auditing of the returns is more than a year in arrears. (Report of Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1916, p. 28.) Reference to the numerical insufficiency of the force is again made on the same page, on page 29, and page 30. It is pointed out on page 34 of this report that the population of the country as assigned to each incometax field officer is 364,963. The commissioner says in his report:

It would be idle to assert that the revenues of the Government could fully collected by a system based on these figures unless they could accepted as the evidence of superhuman zeal and activity. (Id., 35.)

Reference is again made to the necessity of increasing the force, on page 37, where the commissioner says that-

Notwithstanding the provision that has been made for some increase in the internal-revenue force it is not sufficient to keep a large volume of work current.

In view of this insufficiency of the force to properly administer existing tax laws it seems unwise at least to add a new, complicated, and loosely drawn law to the burdens of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The mere enactment of laws is not sufficient to collect revenue. The Government now has under the income-tax law an administrative machine, perfected to some extent, for the collection of revenue.

A few simple examples will show how the tax will work out. Thus a corporation having a capital of, say, $100,000 earns $20,000 of net income, according to its income-tax return. Its actual net income may be considerably less, for it is well known that the Treasury Department does not allow very generous deductions for depreciation. The proposed law permits (1) a deduction of $5,000, leaving $15,000; (2) a deduction of 8 per cent of $100,000, its capital, or $8,000, leaving $7,000 to be taxed. Eight per cent of $7,000 is $560, to be paid in addition to an income tax of $400, and a capital-stock tax of perhaps another $100, or approximately $1,060, in addition to its State and local taxes. Its competitor doing the same business, but as an individual, with the same capital, would pay the Federal Government $320 as an income tax if married and $20 more if single. In brief, to do business as a corporation is to be penalized to the extent of $740.

Assume another corporation has the following capital: Common stock, $100,000; preferred stock drawing 8 per cent dividend, $100,000; bonds drawing 5 per cent interest, $800,000. Its income account is as follows: $100,000 annual income, of which $8,000 pays preferred dividends, $40,000 pays interest on its bonds, leaving $52,000 net for common stockholders. The tax on such a corporation will be $3,920. As the preferred stockholders are paid the fixed preferred dividend regardless of the tax on the net profits, so long as there are sufficient profits remaining, the whole burden of the tax will fall on the common stockholders and will amount to 71 per cent on the entire amount available for distribution to them. In the final analysis the proposed tax will be a tax on common stockholders, and one who purchases the common stock of the company considerably above par will bear an entirely disproportionate share of the

As this proposed tax will be borne entirely by investors in common stock, in the purchase price of which the earning power of the corporation has already been capitalized at the time the law goes into effect, it is an iniquitous and morally indefensible tax, even though it may legally be constitutional and within the power of Congress; but will the proposed law be constitutional in its present form? Undoubtedly not. Its operation will, in some cases, confiscate the entire income of stockholders, as will be shown below.

Let us now consider an actual case of how the tax will operate inequitably. The Supreme Court of the United States has held (Anderson v. 42 Broadway Co.) that where the indebtedness exceeds the capital stock it should no longer be treated as an incident, but that the carrying of the indebtedness should be considered as a principal object of the corporate activities-that the operations of such a corporation are conducted more for the benefit of the creditors than of the stockholders-and that the limited amount of interest which can be deducted before assessing the income tax is not an arbitrary discrimination against the corporation and its stockholders.

Suppose such a real estate corporation having a capital of $1,000 purchases a property then subject to a mortgage of $5,000,000, which it assumes. These are approximately the figures in the 42 Broadway case. Suppose its net profits to be $275,000 before deducting the interest charge of 5 per cent on the mortgage, which would amount to $250,000. come to its stockholders would actually be $25,000. But for the purpose of the income tax the entire interest charge may not be deducted, only the interest paid on one-half of the indebtedness plus an amount equal to the capital stock is allowable; that is, $2,500,000 plus $1,000, or $2,501,000. Thus the net income shown by the income-tax return is $149,950, and this fictitious income is the sum on which the proposed tax is to be levied. Applying the formula then, the tax will be 8 per cent of $149,950, $5,000, $80, or $11,589.60-over 46 per cent of the actual income. Add to this the income tax of 2 per cent on $149,950—$2,299—and we have a total for the two taxes of $14,588.60, 58 per cent of the net income actually payable to the stockholders.

To show how absurd this proposed law is, let us assume that the income in the foregoing example was $260,000, which, after deducting the interest payment of $250,000, would leave $10,000 for the stockholders. The net income figured according to the income-tax law would be $134,950. The excess profits tax would be $10,389.60, the income tax is $2,699, the total $13,088.60. Since its income is only $10,000 the tax exceeds the ability of the corporation to pay by over $3,000. Thus the corporation is literally taxed out of existence.

It will be said that this is an extreme case and that by a fairer definition of net income in the law the wrong will be avoided. A law must be judged by its extreme effects, and even though the tax should be imposed on the actual net income and not on a fictitious income, the proposed law will be complicated and difficult to comply with, the tax will penalize progress and initiative and rest on too small a portion of the annual net income of the country.

Corporations are now required to pay an income tax of 2 per cent under a law that is objected to because of its complexity and technicality, while the principle of the tax is generally approved and a capital-stock tax of 50 cents on each $1,000 of the fair value of the capital stock over $99,000, under a law that is so loosely drawn that its administration involves endless difficulties and differences of opinion between the tax collectors and the taxpayers. We are threatened with a third Federal tax whose only virtue is that it will make the existing law seem simple in comparison.

Mr. President, when the bill is again taken up for consideration, and the amendment on page 3 is reached, I shall submit some remarks against the Senate amendment which places a tax upon insurance companies. That amendment proposes to strike out the following words:

Excepting income derived from the business of life, health, and accident insurance combined in one policy issued on the weekly premium payment plan.

So that if the amendment is agreed to the first paragraph of section 201 will read as follows:

That in addition to the taxes under existing laws there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation and partnership organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, or District thereof, no matter how created or organized, a tax of 8 per cent of the amount by which such net income exceeds the sum of (a) $5,000 plus (b) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested.

I hope that this Senate amendment may be disagreed to. As I say, I desire later to submit a few remarks on that subject; but as it is getting late, I shall not detain the Senate longer this evening. I also wish to say something a little later, perhaps, upon the Underwood amendment, but may not do so, as it has been so fully and ably discussed already. I am opposed to that amendment, and think it is a great injustice to the farmers of this country; and I fear its object is to enable the producers of oleo to impose upon the people of the

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). The question is upon the amendment of the committee, as amended.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, has the question been reached on what is known as the Underwood amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not yet.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to say just a word on that. Perhaps may as well say it at this time. Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I inquire what amendment is before the Senate now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee on page 11, section 401.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will say what I have to say about this amendment at this time and shall be very brief.

do not want to delay the bill in any way.

In the arguments that have been submitted concerning the bill itself I have heard nothing said as to the causes making necessary the passage of this bill except the question of preparedness. The bill seems to be very deftly drawn in order to create the The bill seems to be very derity drawn in order to create the impression in the country that whatever deficit there may be in conducting the affairs of the Government is caused by preparedness expense. We never stop to consider that if the Government is running behind in its receipts, or if extraordinary expenses are incurred, we ought to commence at the other end and cut off some of the expenditures. I do not think the American people are going to believe that the taxation that is heaped upon them is imposed entirely for purposes of preparedness

We are going to keep on having deficits in the Government not only because of preparedness but because of the utterly inefficient way in which the Government's business is carried on.

This year the Democratic platform declared for a budget system. I have prepared an amendment, which I have had printed and submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, along the line of the Democratic platform as nearly as I could construe it, for the purpose of starting, at least, a movement in the direction of a general budget system for our country. We are about the only civilized Nation in the world that does not have a budget system; and these extraordinary expenditures and this overlapping of the work of committees will never stop until we have some kind of a scientific budget system.

This extravagance, Mr. President, is growing upon us. Here is $535,000,000 for the Navy in the naval bill—$5.35 for every man, woman, and child in this country—a bill that really can not under present conditions be opposed. I should think it might be cut down somewhat; but everyone in this country is for a reasonable Navy. Where this is to end no one can predict. Now, this extravagance has developed a system of omnibus appropriations. I have been amazed at this session of Congress to see that this idea has so developed that now we have an omnibus fish-hatchery bill carrying practically $1,000,000 that has passed the House and is on the Senate calendar. We have an omnibus public-building bill, which has passed the House, providing public buildings in towns of less than 600 population and providing sites for public buildings in towns that had no population when the census of 1910 was taken. That bill, I think, is sleeping "the sleep that knows no waking" in the committee; there are also other omnibus bills. A system is growing up of omnibus appropriations that is going to keep on and on calling upon the people for greater taxation, so we have to increase the revenue continually.

I do not like to oppose a revenue bill at this time, when the country needs the revenue; and I can not get very enthusiastic in opposing a tax upon the earnings of corporations in excess of 8 per cent. The bill as it now stands is, however, full of inde-fensible propositions. I can not vote for it in its present form. Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator, but I do not want the Senator to delay me. I want to get through, Mr. VARDAMAN. I think I have a good deal of sympathy with the motives which actuate the honorable Senator and the purpose which he seeks to promote in the matter of taxation. It is really refreshing at this time to find a Member of Congress who will undertake to weather the storm of war hysteria which is sweeping over the country like a simoon, and dare to stand out in the open and defend the political and business rights of the plain people. Never before in the history of this Nation was greater demand for some one with the power to defend their rights and protect their interests. The question of expenses and the source whence the revenue comes are passed over by some as matters of inconsequential concern. The military spirit is in the ascendancy, and the question of preparing for war is of paramount importance. I should like to ask the Sena-tor from Iowa if he will not in the course of his remarks—that is, if he has the data at hand-state to the Senate the dif-ference between the amounts appropriated for the current expenses of the Government—for public buildings, rivers and har-bors, and other appropriations of that character—made by this Congress and the sessions of Congress preceding this administration. It is my impression that the appropriations for those purposes have not been greater for the last four years than they were prior to that time.

The enormous appropriations that we are to make at this ses sion are largely for so-called "preparedness," and making ready for a war that will never be fought if we are true to ourselves as a Nation and a people and just to the nations of the world. I have no sympathy whatever with the proposition to increase our Army and to enlarge our Navy to the enormous proportions which the bills before Congress contemplate. It is an unwarranted prodigality of cash; in my judgment, a shameless disregard of our obligations to our constituents. It imposes a burden which will bear heavily upon the producers of this country; it is an injustice to the world and a pandering to the brutish instincts of man. To carry out this unfortunate policy we must tax several times everything that man uses between the cradle and the grave. There has never been advanced or suggested in this Chamber an argument based upon fact to justify such a policy.

Mr. KENYON. A large part of that, of course, is true. The appropriations, the Senator well knows, have been increased for all these other matters. Some years they have gone very high. In other years certain appropriation bills have been defeated. But there is a general increase in the omnibus appropriation bills and in the system of omnibus appropriations. have a good-roads bill that will, I fear, grow into a mighty pork barrel before we get through.

I do not like the feature of the bill which gives the power to issue $500,000,000 in certificates by the Treasury Department. That has been raised $200,000,000 over the House. I trust this may not be agreed to. I hope the provision as to the tax on oleo or margarine may be wiped from the bill, and I rose just to offer an explanation of my vote on that question.

We have heard a good deal about the tax being a tax on the poor man's butter. Yet, if that argument holds good now the poor man's butter, if oleo is the poor man's butter, pays a tax of only one-fourth of a cent per pound, while under this bill it will pay a tax of 2 cents per pound if not colored.

It seems to me that if people want to eat oleo that is their right; it is their privilege. If people want to eat butter and can afford to do so, it is their privilege. But the tax on colored eleo of 10 cents per pound is virtually a tax on fraud to wipe out fraud. Feeling that way about it, I feel it is my duty to oppose the Underwood amendment and support the law as it now stands. It is not a tax upon the poor man's butter as it now stands. If the oleo is uncolored, it will be as severe as if the Underwood amendment is adopted.

I do not believe, Mr. President, as a general proposition we make any mistake in standing by the American cow. The cow is a very necessary friend of everybody in the Nation. We have been regaled to-day by various stories and interchanges between the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Warren] as to their early experiences. The Senator from Vermont in his appeal for the American cow talks of rising at 4 in the morning and milking the cows, and the Senator from Wyoming goes him one hour better, and his hour to rise was 3 o'clock in the morning. Of course every man in public life has more or less from the stump talked that way, but I have never yet known of a politician getting up at 3 o'clock in the morning. I never claimed to get up any earlier than 5 o'clock, but possibly after I have run for office as long as the Senator from Wyoming I may get around to 3 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. May I interrogate the Senator? I only wish to make an inquiry.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to delay the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Will not that pastoral condition which the Senator can look back to with such pleasure be largely eliminated by the machinery which milks the cows? I understand that they can be milked by electrical machinery now.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; and the Senator is probably glad that he is not operating any of those machines.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I have not tried to operate it.
Mr. KENYON. I will say to my farmer friend from Pennsylvania that the electric milker has not been a success. So the Senator from Wyoming may still have to rise in the early morning hour.

Mr. President, I do not desire to make any extended remarks. I shall vote against the Underwood proposition for the reasons which I have stated. It will help a fraud; it will help no one in this country but the packers; it will be a distinct blow against the American farmer in the hard conditions which so often confront him. Honest treatment is all we ask for the great dairy interests of this country. Let us put no premium on fraud and deception. Let us give the American cow a square deal.

I should like to have permission to insert as a part of my remarks the evidence given by ex-Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, before the House committee some years ago when this question was there. I have marked the part which I ask that the reporter may insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The consumers and producers of butter have asked Congress to enact into law House bill 3717, which provides in the first section that all counterfeit substance for butter, when taken into any State or Territory, shall be subject to the laws of the State or Territory concerning such counterfeit.

With a tax of 10 cents a pound on the counterfeit, we believe these temptations for these profits and the deceptive sale and dishonorable and dangerous conspiring against the law and fraudulent competition against an honest industry will be greatly modified.

A great many people ask why it is not as permissible to color oleomargarine as it is to color butter. I would answer, Because they are not colored for the same purpose. Butter in winter is too light to suit the taste of most consumers. The highest value is in fresh butter not more than 10 days old. The consumer asks that it bear the yellow summer color of butter. That is a matter of taste, not deception, for it is not colored to resemble something it is not. But oleomargarine is colored to make it resemble butter, which it is not. It is colored not for the benefit or taste of its consumer but to deceive the consumer.

Said President Cleveland, in his message approving oleomargarine legislation of 1886:

"Not the least important incident related to this legislation is the defense afforded to the consumer against the fraudulent substitution and sale of an imitation for a genuine article of food of a very general household use. "I venture to say that hardly a pound ever entered a poor man's house under its real name and in its true character."

The argument still holds good.

The argument still holds good.

There is no credible evidence to show that oleomargarine is innocuous; no evidence to show that when eaten continuously in place of butter it is not harmful. But there are reports in great abundance to the effect that oleomargarine is harmful.

Mr. Edmund Hill, a member of the Somerset County Council, England, reports that the great bulk of oleomargarine, or "margarine," as it is called there, is eaten in public institutions, convents, schools, etc. At the Wells Asylum, with which he is connected, the inmates receive oleomargarine. In the asylums of Dorset, Wells, and Hants—the adjoining counties—butter is furnished, and the death rate at Wells is 30 per cent higher. At the Taunton Hospital there were 11 deaths in 13 months. Oleomargarine was substituted, and in 9 months the deaths rose to 22. rose to 22.

rose to 22.

This accords with the experience in France, where its use in hospitals is forbidden. In the United States, in institutions for the blind and for girls, it has been noticed that the use of eleomargarine lowered the vitality of the inmates very perceptibly.

There is abundant reason for this. The normal heat of the human stomach is 98°. Butter melts at 92°, 6° below the heat of the stomach (passes into pancreatic emulsion and digestion). Nature designed this fat in its raw state for food.

Oleomargarine melts at the varying temperature of 102° to 108°, a temperature no healthful stomach ever attains. As a consequence, this unnatural foreign fat must be expelled by sheer gastric action and force.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall take only a very few minutes of the time of the Senate, more to explain my vote than anything else, but I can not let this opportunity pass to discuss such an important question as I regard this to be.

I am very sorry that the great dairy industry has been attacked. If the dairy industry is a dishonest one it ought to be discontinued. If the products from the cow, butter and cheese and other things which are manufactured from milk, form an unhealthy article of food we should discontinue producing it or manufacturing it.

I have no quarrel with men who are engaged in the business of manufacturing oleomargarine. It is a legitimate business if sold for what it is. That question has been so thoroughly discussed on this floor that it is hardly necessary for me to go into it. However, there is this about it. I do not know of a single instance where the dairy farmer or the creamery has made any attempt to sell its product to take the place of the product manufactured by the oleomargarine manufacturers. There is a difference of opinion as to how many farmers there are engaged in dairying, but there are in the United States between 20,000,000 and 25,000,00 milch cows. That is a great industry. It seems to me the question is, if these people are engaged in an honest industry, if they are producing an article of food that is healthful, it is wrong for anyone to try and impose upon this industry and to substitute an article which is adulterated to take its place because that is a fraud.

adulterated to take its place, because that is a fraud.

I said, Mr. President, that I find no fault with the manufacturers of oleomargarine if they confine themselves in a legitimate way to disposing of their products. But we all know from the ingredients with which oleomargarine is manufactured that it is not butter. We all know that there is not a single pound of oleomargarine sold as butter that does not contain some butter or has not at least gone through the process of churning either in milk or in cream to make it appear like butter. It is this gigantic fraud that I am opposed to. It is this adulteration which has been committed by the American manufacturers ever since they commenced their business in this country.

Those of us who were engaged in the dairy business in the years of 1880 to 1890 well know that these same manufacturers were not even willing to sell their lard for what it was. Lard at that time was worth more than cottonseed oil. We lost our trade with England, we lost our trade with the European countries, simply because the manufacturers adulterated their lard and mixed it with cottonseed oil.

I certainly have no quarrel with the people who produce or manufacture cottonseed oil. That is a legitimate industry. But you have no right to take cottonseed oil and manufacture it into something else and call it something else, whether it is butter or lard or any other article of food.

The dairy industry is, as I believe, an honest industry. It is being carried on by millions of people who live in our country and it is the only business they have. It is not so with the manufacturers of oleomargarine. The manufacturers of oleomargarine control the entire product of beef. They control the prices not only of cattle but of swine and of sheep. It is not so with the millions of dairy farmers who in a legitimate way are producing an article of food that no man and no chemist has dared to say is unwholesome as an article of food.

When you talk about the uncleanliness of these creameries, it is hardly necessary to make a reply to that statement. If you are afraid that this article of food is unwholesome and unhealthy, we ask you to make an appropriation and investigate these creameries, for we are appropriating every year $3,000,000 for the inspection of meat. The Beef Trust does not pay for its own inspection; it is paid for by the Government of the United States, by the people of the United States.

Now, if you are afraid that butter and cheese and other articles produced on the farm are unwholesome, provide for Federal inspection, and I know that the farmers of the United States will welcome it. I know that they will be only too glad to have a Federal inspector inspect every pound of the product of the farm.

But it is not true, Mr. President, that these creameries are so insanitary as has been charged. I say it is not true in my section of the country, because we have inspection laws in our State. We have in the State of North Dakota, and I know they have in the State of Minnesota, and I presume they have in the other neighboring States, most rigid and drastic State inspection laws. So it is hardly fair to make such an onslaught upon this honest industry carried on by honest men and women who are making their livelihood from this industry.

Mr. President, I can hardly conceive that any man who has the interest of this class of people at heart would be willing to make such an indictment against this great industry. We are not claiming that the articles of the beef industry or the Beef Trust are unwholesome. We are not claiming here or anywhere that the great Beef Trust which controls the price of every animal product in our country, and not only that but branches out and controls the grain industry of the country as well—the men who have made their millions by purchasing their products from these millions of farmers are not satisfied to let the farmers continue when these great concerns find that they can make a substitute by which they can impose upon the American people fraudulently. I weigh my words when I say fraudulently, because I have before me here records to show that from 1880 to 1890 the lard manufactured by these great concerns was adulterated at least to the extent of 33½ per cent. They saw an opportunity to increase their profits by substituting cottonseed oil for lard. They have been knocking at the doors of Congress for 30 years, asking to be permitted to substitute oleomargarine for butter—not oleo alone but different articles mixed, vegetable oils, anything that could be purchased that was cheap. They have been asking to be permitted to make an imitation and to sell it for butter. And who, I ask, is paying for this adulterated article?

Mr. President, whenever the farmers ask for something they ask it for themselves, and they are honest enough to say that it is going to benefit them. But when these gigantic trusts and the men who have been found guilty under the law of imposing frauds upon the American people want the Congress of the United States to pass laws beneficial to them they come here masked. They are not asking it for themselves but for the poor laboring man and in behalf of the farmer. Oh, they are very generous! They always forget themselves. They always look out for the dear people; not for their own benefit, no, but for the benefit of the poor laboring man.

Mr. President, how are you going to benefit the laboring man by imposing a tax upon an article which you say is good for food? How are you going to benefit the laboring man by making it possible to have an inferior article sold for a superior article? Is it not reasonable to believe that the price of the inferior article will be brought up or that the article will be sold perhaps at as high a price as the better article?

Mr. President, it is a sham and a fraud upon the American people, and I am sorry that the great Democratic Party has seen fit to incorporate in a bill, which is said to be an emergency measure, a tax upon what you say is a necessary article of food. There is not a chemist in the United States who has said that butter is unwholesome; there is not a chemist in the world who has said that butter is subject to tubercular bacilli. I have here before me House hearings in 1910, and if I wanted to I could take up considerable time of the Senate; I have here hundreds of pages of testimony, and nowhere will you find that any of the men who ought to be looking after the welfare of the farmers rather than the welfare of the manufacturers have dared to say that butter is unwholesome, or that butter is more subject to tubercular bacilli than is any other article of food.

Oh, Mr. President, I hope that the farmers of this country will not be compelled to come to Congress and ask that the name of this great department shall be changed. We call it the Department of Agriculture; and yet when we read the statements of these experts, these men who are supposed to advise the farmers, we very often—at least, I do—infer that they are more friendly to those interests which are not beneficial to the farmer than they are to the farmer.

I repeat, I hope the day will never come when we shall make the change, although I have received hundreds of letters from farmers in different parts of the country saying that the name of the Agricultural Department should be changed, that instead of being called the "Department of Agriculture" it ought to be called the "Department of the Packers and Millers." Personally I think these charges are unwarranted.

There are 7,000,000 farmers in the United States, and the 35,000,000 people who are now on those farms making an honest living and doing the best they can, can not quit the farm because it is their home; it is not as it is in many money-making industries where, if the industry fails, you can shut down; but that can not be done on the farm. You have no right to impose upon a class of people of this kind a law such as is proposed in this bill, for it is a sham and a fraud not only upon the farmer but upon the consumer. If anyone wants to eat oleomargarine, let him buy it and let him eat it to his heart's content; but do not mislead him and say it is butter when you know it is not. When you take the numerous reports, you will find that on an average they use in the manufacture of oleomargarine about 4 per cent of butter and about 10 per cent of milk or cream, which amounts to the same as about 4 per cent of butter, for a gallon of cream will make about 4 pounds of butter. Does that not indicate that they are committing a fraud, that they are trying to make this article of food, which they say is so wholesome, look like something which it is not?

Mr. President, I am going to take up a few minutes to show the Senate that it is not only in the United States where these people are operating. I read from the House hearings of 1910, at page 113. I have here a report from James Foust, dairy and food commissioner of France. This report shows that the Government of France prosecuted 497 cases, I think, in a single month for the violation of the oleomargarine law. In France, as I understand, they do not permit colored oleomargarine to be sold. I have here the translation of extracts from public document No. 1377, of the French Chamber of Deputies, extraordinary session, 1903, which reads as follows:

traordinary session, 1903, which reads as follows:

Falsifications of food products were becoming more and more common. In 1869 margarine was invented by M. Mége-Mouries, and its similarity to butter made it possible to offer it for sale as such. In fact, at first, margarine was only used for this purpose, until the numerous complaints led to the enactment of the law of March 14, 1887, which reserves the designation "butter" exclusively to products of milk. It was prohibited to sell the imitation under any other designation than margarine. The law, however, did not fix any penalties for infractions and violations. To discover the fraud was also nearly impossible, as the law only prohibited the substitution of margarine for butter, but did not refer to mixtures or fix any maximum or minimum proportion of margarine that might he permitted.

The complaints continued and led to the enactment of the law of April 14, 1897, the purpose of which was not only the punishment of frauds but also their prevention. One of the most important features of the new law was that it prohibited the manufacture and sale of butter and margarine in the same room. The one who procures so that margarine. Inspectors are appointed by the Government and have authority to enter stores, depots, magazines, and factories and to take the samples necessary for the examination.

The law further prescribes that margarine shall be labeled distinctly and indelibly as such, and that the name of the manufacturer shall appear very distinctly.

This led to another fraud. The manufactures printed the name of the firm was printed so as to entirely catch the eye.

Now, just observe, Mr. President, that in order to stop this

Now, just observe, Mr. President, that in order to stop this fraudulent practice in the country of France the manufacturers of this product, which it is claimed is demanded and so much desired by the American people, were compelled to print in large letters its real name. This very article, which some Senators have said is so superior to the article produced by the farmer or by the dairy industry, is required in France to be marked— not the package but the article itself—with large indelible let-ters. That is the only way the Government of France could prevent this great fraud being carried on and practiced upon the people of that country. I read again:

The committee recommends to reverse this, so that the very distinct and indelible shall refer to the product, while the name of the firm may be printed in smaller letters.

They simply changed the thing about, and instead of having the name of the firm printed in large letters they enacted a law declaring that the sellers and manufacturers of oleomar-garine might use small letters to print their own name, but they must print in large letters the name of the article, to show that this fraudulent substance, oleomargarine, this substitute for and adulteration of butter, was not butter.

Article 2 of the law of April 14, 1897, reads:

All food products outside of butter, no matter what their origin or composition, which are similar to butter and prepared for the same use as butter, shall only be designated as margarine.

To margarine, thus defined, must not be added coloring matter.

So in France the coloring of margarine is absolutely prohibited by law.

ART. 3. Producers of butter must not keep margarine or oleomargarine in their stores or at other places; neither shall they permit anybody else to keep such products in their stores.

This prohibition also applies to merchants, agents, and dealers in Ins promotion also applies to merchants, agents, and dealers in butter.

Margarine and oleomargarine must only be offered for sale at places especially designated for that purpose by the municipal authorities.

ART. 4. All manufacturers of margarine and oleomargarine must make a declaration—in Paris to the chief of police, in the provinces to the mayor of the community.

ART. 5. Buildings where margarine is prepared, kept, or sold must be provided with a sign, in letters at least 30 centimeters high, containing the following: "Factory depot, for sale of margarine and oleomargarine."

ART. 9. All boxes, cases, and packages containing margarine or oleomargarine must be labeled as stated above.

ART. 11. It is prohibited to keep or sell margarine or oleomargarine not labeled as indicated above. The absence of the label will cause that the product will be considered as butter.

Now we come to the nepalties.

Now we come to the penalties.

Ant. 16. Those who willfully violate the prescriptions of this law shall be punished by imprisonment from six days to three months and a fine of from 100 to 5,000 francs, or only one of said penalties. Persons who will not name seller or shipper of the goods will be considered as principals.

Express or transportation companies on land or sea that have violated the prescriptions in articles 10 and 12 may be fined from 50 to 500 frances.

to 500 francs.

Persons preventing inspectors and experts from performing their duties, refusing them admittance to their factories, depots, and stores, and refusing to deliver samples, may be fined from 500 to 1,000 francs.

ART. 17. The use of matter which may have an injurious effect on the health in making margarine shall be punished according to article 423 of the Penal Code.

ART. 19. The courts may always order verdicts of conviction of violation of this law published in newspapers or by means of placards.

ART. 20. Matters and mixtures designated as fraudulent may be confiscated.

A decree of November 9, 1897, contains the regulations for the appli-cation of the law of April 14, 1897.

So much for the country of France. If this article of oleomargarine is superior to butter, why have foreign countries!

been compelled to enact laws compelling the manufacturers of oleomargarine to say that it is oleomargarine, and not butter?

I have never yet heard, even in the case of the operator of one of the little creameries so graphically described by Senators on this floor the other day, of a single prosecution of any one of the men engaged in the creamery industry or in the making of butter from milk for any violation of the law in attempting to sell their product as oleomargarine. As my friend from Oregon [Mr. LANE] so well said the other day, if butter is bad, it is honest enough to look you in the face and admit it. There is no deception about bad butter any more than there is about good butter. If butter becomes old and rancid, it is honest enough to tell you so. It is not like this fraudulent article of oleomargarine-and when I say "fraudulent" I mean when it is colored and sold as butter-and passed off for something that it is not.

I am sometimes surprised, Mr. President, that the great Beef Trust, which has been permitted under our laws and our institutions to make these hundreds of millions undisturbed, is shortsighted enough to attack an industry like the dairy industry of the country, for it simply goes to show that it is intoxicated with its power, and its greed and lust for money overpowers it. This same trust not only controls the entire beef industry of the country, but it is also attempting to, and it does, successfully control the grain industry of the country. Yet you are bringing in here a bill, and calling it an emergency measure, attacking these six or seven million farmers and these 35,000,000 people who are making an honest living-and that is all they makeout of this industry; not only that, but you want to impose upon the labor of this country and substitute in their diet this adulterated, fraudulent article and compel them to pay the trust's price, more than it is worth.

If the laboring man wants to buy oleomargarine uncolored, let him buy it. If the Beef Trust wants to sell eleomargarine for what it is, let it sell it. We find no fault with that; but you will not with my vote sell it for butter, because, as I have shown you here this afternoon, the makers of this product use on an average 4 per cent of butter in order to practice this fraud and deception, and they use on an average about 10 per cent of milk in churning and in mixing these different ingredients, making in all about 8 per cent of butter.

Mr. President, I make the statement, and I challenge contradiction, that there is not a single pound of butterine or oleomargarine sold without some butter in it; but it is being sold to these poor men whom this great, philanthropic trust is anxious to benefit as butter. They are not asking for legislation to benefit themselves. They are asking for this legislation in order to be able to help the poor man, the laboring man, the man who can not afford to buy butter!

Why, Mr. President, butter is not the only thing upon which these great philanthropists have practiced their fraud and deception. You all remember what a contest we had on bleached flour. You all know the great fight that has been going on trying to stop it, and I think it finally has been stopped-I refer to the practice of bleaching flour. As I said the other day, anyone who is at all familiar with the real value of wheat knows that it is the amber-colored part of the kernel, the aleurone or the gluten, that is valuable for flour. That is not white, but an amber color. Every woman who has made bread, and who is familiar with conditions, knows that it is not always the white bread that is the most wholesome bread. We had our fight on this blenched-flour question, but fortunately there came to our rescue at that time some of the great corporations, because their interests were affected; and if it had not been for those corporations I suppose we would have been told that flour and bread were unwholesome unless they were pure white.

I have shown to the Senate that in the country of France the laws prohibit the coloring of oleomargarine. They prohibit selling it in any store. Now, we will take the country of Germany. It is rather a daring thing, I suppose, to speak about Germany, but I am not going to speak about the people of Germany. I am simply going to talk about butter and oleomarga-

In Germany they passed a law on June 15, 1897, to this effect: The prescriptions, rules, and regulations governing the butter trade and the production and sale of margarine, margarine cheese—

These philanthropists are not satisfied with butter alone, but they want to get hold of the cheese industry as well. They have tried that for years, also and artificial fats are nearly identical with the French ones, only the German law does not contain any prohibition against coloring margarine, etc., so as to appear like natural butter, etc. These products have to be manufactured and sold in separate stores provided with signs indicating the kind of goods manufactured and sold. The packages have to be labeled as in France, and, besides, must be marked with a very conspicuous red border.

Just think of it! In Germany they have to mark these packages with a red border, I presume something like the color of the automobile of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Pen-ROSE], so that it can be easily detected.

When sold without wrappers the pieces shall have a cubic shape and the denomination of the goods must be imprinted in the goods itself.

That is where the fraud comes in in this bill. You do not provide in this bill that the goods themselves shall have an imprint upon them. You only provide for the label on the packages, and the packages can very easily be thrown away, as everybody knows.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS-CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President— The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield. Mr. BRYAN. I understand it is the agreement to take a recess at 6 o'clock until 8 to-night. Let me ask the Senator if he would object to yielding the floor now, so that I may present a conference report?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I shall be very glad to do so. I will resume what I desire to say after 8 o'clock.

Mr. BRYAN. If it is agreeable to the Senator, then I submit the conference report on Senate bill 1878, and move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will be

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1878) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, which

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, after a conference lasting 20 days, and having once been rejected by the Senate, the conferees on the Indian bill (H. R. 18453) have submitted to the Senate, and it was printed some days ago, a full, final, and complete report. It is now obvious to me, and I believe also to other Senators, that with a certain provision in the bill the Senate will not adopt the conference report. I refer to the provision proposing to raise the salaries of certain Government employees. The Senate conferees agreed to the House amendment, but by virtue of certain action which has been taken in the Senate on a yea-and-nay vote, and from conversations I have had with many persons, it is evident that the Senate will never agree to the conference report on this bill with the House amendment in it, and that the Senate is going to insist upon and prefer what is termed "the Smoot amendment."

I therefore ask that the conference report be disagreed to, so that we may go back and try again to get this matter into a situation where it will be agreed to by both Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona requests that the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill be rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arizona in what respect the report as agreed upon as to the salaries of clerks differs from the so-called Smoot amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. The amendment as agreed upon by the conferees provides that certain persons who are receiving salaries of $1,200 per year or less shall have a certain increase—to wit, 15 per cent—and those receiving from $1,200 to $1,800, both inclusive, shall receive an increase of 10 per cent, whereas it is evident that the Senate wishes to adhere to what is termed "the Smoot amendment," which provides for a smaller raise in salaries

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will indulge me fur-

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon what action of the Senate does the Senator predicate that supposition or belief?

Mr. ASHURST. On a yea-and-nay vote on the Agricultural bill the other morning that very question was tested.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I for one did not regard that by any means as a test vote upon that question. There were other things involved in that report; and I for one voted to send it back because of another provision in the bill. Personally, I am heartily in favor of the increases made in this bill, as I understand them.

Mr. ASHURST. That is, the House amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I mean the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ASHURST. We adopted the House amendment in conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; the House amendment. gether prefer it to the Smoot amendment, and I should be very glad to have an opportunity to have that matter tried out by the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, it would be too late this evening, and I do not want to get this bill into a situation where by reason of the impasse we will be unable to do anything with it. I will say that it is my opinion that I can not get the conference report adopted or agreed to by the Senate with that amendment in it. That is my opinion. That, of course, will kill the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to any Senator—all Senators, The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yleld first?

Mr. ASHURST. To the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I thought it present to the fact that before the vote was taken in reference to the action of the Agricultural Committee, I, having charge of that bill, made the statement that when the yea-and-nay vote was taken I would consider it as final and binding as to whether the Senate was then instructing us by that vote in regard to the Smoot amendment. I did not take sides pro or con; and it was repeated over on this side when the vote was taken, which was, as I remember, 71 or 72 to 3 in favor of sending it back with reference to the Smoot amendment. I reiterated that once or twice, and the understanding of the conferees who have charge of the Agricultural bill was to the effect that the Senate had committed itself by that vote to the Smoot amendment. That was my understanding.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not so understand it.

Mr. ASHURST. Well, I do not wish to press the matter. It is now time to recess; but I should like to have some action taken at the very earliest moment, because the House has agreed to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator if he will not call up this conference report this evening, or at the very earliest moment?

Mr. ASHURST. Why, certainly, Mr. President. I withdraw the motion at this time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply wanted to know what the Senator from Arizona had done with this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Arizona that the Senate disagree to the conference report is withdrawn for the present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh! He withdraws the conference re-

WEST INDIAN ISLANDS-CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 719).

Mr. STONE. I present the conference report on House bill 20755, known as the West Indian Islands bill, and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20755) to provide a temporary government for the West Indian Islands acquired by the United States from Denmark by the convention entered into between said countries on the 4th day of August, 1916, and ratified by the Senate of the United States on the 7th day of September, 1916, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

"That, except as hercinafter provided, all military, civil, and judicial powers necessary to govern the West Indian Islands acquired from Denmark shall be vested in a governor and in such person or persons as the President may appoint and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct until Congress shall provide for the government of said islands: Provided, That the President may assign an officer of the Army or Navy to serve as such governor and perform the duties appertaining to said office: And provided further, That the governor of the said islands shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: And provided further, That the compensation of all persons appointed under this act shall be fixed by the President.

"Sec. 2. That until Congress shall otherwise provide, in so far as compatible with the changed sovereignty and not in conflict with the provisions of this act, the laws regulating elections and the electoral franchise as set forth in the code of laws published at Amalienborg the 6th day of April, 1906, and the other local laws, in force and effect in said islands on the 17th day of January, 1917, shall remain in force and effect in said islands, and the same shall be administered by the civil officials and through the local judicial tribunals established in said islands, respectively; and the orders, judgments, and decrees of said judicial tribunals shall be duly enforced. With the approval of the President, or under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, any of said laws may be repealed, altered, or amended by the colonial council having jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the judicial tribunals of said islands shall extend to all judicial proceedings and controversies in said islands to which the United States or any citizen thereof may be a party. In all cases arising in the said West Indian Islands and now reviewable by the courts of Denmark, writs of error and appeals shall be to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, and, except as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, the Judgments, orders, and decrees of such court shall be final in all such cases.

"Sec. 3. That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States or its possessions, from the West Indian Islands ceded to the United States by Denmark, the rates of duty and internal-revenue taxes which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries:

Provided, That all articles, the growth or product of, or manufactured in such islands from materials the growth or product of such islands or of the United States, or of both, or which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per cent of their total value, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, coming into the United States from such islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty

"SEC. 4. That until Congress shall otherwise provide all laws now imposing taxes in the said West Indian Islands, including the customs laws and regulations, shall, in so far as compatible with the changed sovereignty and not otherwise herein provided, continue in force and effect, except that articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States shall be admitted there free of duty: Provided, That upon exportation of sugar to any foreign country, or the shipment thereof to the United States or any of its possessions, there shall be levied, collected, and paid thereon an export duty of $8 per ton of 2,000 pounds irrespective of polariscope test, in lieu of any export tax now required by law.

"Sec. 5. That the duties and taxes collected in pursuance of this act shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States, but shall be used and expended for the Government and benefit of said islands under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

"SEC. 6. That for the purpose of taking over and occupying said islands and of carrying this act into effect and to meet any deficit in the revenues of the said islands resulting from the provisions of this act the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States.

"Sec. 7. That the sum of $25,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Trensury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid in the city of Washington to the diplomatic representative or other agent of His Majesty the King of Denmark duly authorized to receive said money, in full consideration of the cession of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United the cession of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States made by the convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Denmark entered into August 4, 1916, and ratified by the Senate of the United States on the 7th day of September, 1916.

"Sec. 8. That this act, with the exception of section 7, shall be in force and effect and become operative immediately upon the payment by the United States of said sum of $25,000,000. The fact and date of such payment shall thereupon be made public by a proclamation issued by the President and published in the said Danish West Indian Islands and in the United States. Section 7 shall become immediately effective and the appropriation thereby provided for shall be immediately avail-

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate now take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m. on the expiration of the recess.

THE NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT (S. DOC. NO. 718).

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting additional and supplemental esti-mates of appropriations required for the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, amounting to $164,784,-859.01, including $1,403,020 heretofore submitted. The communication and accompanying paper will be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, to report back the bill (S. 8168) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, and for other purposes, with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 1106) thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

MARINE-HOSPITAL LANDS IN CHICAGO.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 7905) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to transfer and convey to the commissioners of Lincoln Park, of Chicago, Ill., the riparian rights of the United States, as the owner of land fronting on Lake Michigan and occupied as the site of the United States Marine Hospital in Chicago, Ill., and I submit a report (No. 1107) thereon. This bill has the approval of the department, subject to the conditions named in it.

Mr. LEWIS. In behalf of my colleague [Mr. Sherman] may I ask the Senate if possible that it may consent that the bill may be immediately put on its passage? Around the Marine Hospital there is some land which the park commissioners wish to take off the Government's hands and the city improve it itself, and the Government merely wishes to permit it. That is the end of the story. The park commissioners will take it and improve it as the Government wishes.

Mr. JONES. And it is to revert to the Government if the conditions are not complied with.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to state that the park commissioners will add 100 feet on the east of the land where the United States Marine Hospital on the lake shore fronts. It will relieve the Government of $40,000 which is taken out of the bill by the Secretary of War to repair the breakwater. That will be done by the park commissioners and the maintenance guaranteed.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill read so that we can just see what the conditions are, and whether the land is to revert to the Government in case it is not used for the purpose named in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

The amendment of the committee was, in line 8, after the word "upon," to strike out "such terms and conditions as he may impose" and insert: "the condition that the said rights and any lands which may be added to the present water front of said Marine Hospital site shall be used for no other purpose than that authorized in the statute of the State of Illinois, entitled 'An act to enable the park commissioners having control of any park bordering upon public waters in this State to enlarge the same from time to time, and granting submerged lands for the purpose of such enlargements, and to defray the cost thereof, approved June 15, 1895, and upon such other terms and conditions as they may impose."

Mr. FLETCHER. It should read as he may impose. The grant is made by the Secretary of the Treasury. The amendment is in accordance with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask if there is any provision in the bill providing that if the land is not used for the purpose mentioned in the bill it shall revert to the Government of the United States?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely that condition is contained in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I want to know and that is why I wanted to have the bill read.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator will find the amendment meets the condition he has in mind.

Mr. SMOOT. If that condition is in the amendment, I have no objection to the bill; but unless that provision is in the bill, I shall object to the consideration of it. I ask that the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "upon," insert:

the condition that the said rights to any lands which may be added to the present water front of said Marine Hospital site shall be used for no other purpose than that authorized in the statute of the State of Illinois, etc.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not state that in case the lands are not used for the purpose mentioned in the bill they shall revert to the Government. It says they shall be used for no other purpose than that authorized in the statutes of the State of Illinois. It is good as far as it goes, but in nearly all the grants of land reported by the Public Lands Committee of either House there is a provision that whenever the lands are not used for the purpose named in the act they shall revert to the Government of the United States. I think that ought to be included in the

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood that was in the bill. It was in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and if not in the bill I would be very glad to have added that in the event the conditions are not fulfilled it shall revert to the Govern-

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment is precisely in the language given by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. If the suggested amendment to the amendment is accepted, I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah should in form and in the exact words be read before the bill is finally passed. I think the Secretary ought at least to take down in writing the words and read

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That in the event the said lands are not used for the purposes specified in this act the same shall revert to the Government of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BATTLE FIELD OF GUILFORD COURTHOUSE-CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 8229) to establish a national military park at the battle field of Guilford Courthouse, and I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman] to the report.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will be read.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8229) to establish a national military park at the battle field of Guilford Courthouse, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 4

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Sec. 4. That the affairs of the Guilford Courthouse National Military Park shall, subject to the supervision and direction of the Secretary of War, be in charge of three commissioners, one of whom shall be an actual resident of Guilford County, State of North Carolina, one an actual resident of the State of Maryland, and one an actual resident of the State of Dela-They shall be appointed by the Secretary of War, the actual resident of Guilford County, State of North Carolina, so appointed to serve, unless sooner relieved, for a term of four years. The resident commissioner shall act as chairman and as secretary of the commission. One of the other commissioners so appointed shall serve for a term of three years and the other for a term of two years unless sooner relieved. Upon the expiration of the terms of said commissioners the Secretary of War shall, in the manner hereinbefore prescribed, appoint their succeessors to serve, unless sooner relieved, for a term of four years each from the date of their respective appointments. The office of said commissioners shall be in the city of Greensboro, N. C. The resident commissioner shall receive as compensation $1,000 per annum, the nonresident commissioners $100 per annum each, and they shall not be entitled to any other pay or allowances of any kind whatso-

And the Senate agree to the same.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, when the Senate took a recess I was trying to inform the Senate, quoting from the House hearings of 1910, of certain laws in the various countries of I find that in England the law of 1887 contains provisions practically identical with those of France and Germany. Fines are imposed for a violation of the law of £20 for the first offense, £50 for the second, £100 for the third, and later penalties are imposed. Holland has practically the same law. Belgium likewise has practically the same law relative to oleomargarine.

In Russia margarine may only be manufactured at places especially designated for that purpose. The establishment where margarine is prepared is subject to inspection. Colored margarine so as to make it appear like butter is absolutely prohibited. Packages containing margarine must be distinctly labeled and state the name of the manufacturing firm. The factories and stores must be provided with signs indicating the kinds of goods manufactured.

I realize that there are times when it hurts to know the truth, but, nevertheless, I am going to trespass upon your patience for a few minutes more and give you some information about oleomargarine.

I said that in Russia the coloring of margarine was absolutely prohibited, and that the factories and stores where this article is sold must be provided with signs indicating the kinds of goods manufactured and sold. Importations of margarine from foreign countries are also prohibited, and violations are punished by imprisonment of one month or a fine of 100 rubles. It seems that even in far-distant Russia, of which we hear so much, and sometimes not the most favorable comments, they have learned to know the real value of oleomargarine, and it has not been sold as butter.

They do not permit the coloring of oleomargarine in Russia; and yet we are about to attempt to legalize such an act here in the United States of America. In Austria they have practically the same law. The same is true of Denmark. When I speak of Denmark it must be remembered that it is a little country, comprising about 15,000 square miles, and yet feeding about two and a quarter of a million people; and I know of no country where the people are compelled to live on a dairy diet any more than they are in the country of Denmark. I should like to have the men who are so well prepared on statistics show me the tubercular bacilli affecting the physical condition of the Dane. I believe that the health conditions of the country of Denmark not only compare favorably with those of the United States, but that they are really much better. You can not show me a single country where the people live on dairy products in which they are not healthy.

In the countries where this deception and fraud is prohibited by law their chemists are perhaps as skillful as are our chemists. I made the statement before the recess this evening that the purposes of the park, and to ascertain and mark with his- not a single chemist in the United States has made the statement that butter is unwholesome, nor has the statement been made that it is a dangerous food product. On the contrary, we know that it is being recommended as a most wholesome article of food.

Why, Mr. President, cottonseed oil has its place-I have no quarrel with the cottonseed oil people—to be used for what God Almighty intended it for. It is useful as an article in mixing paint. It takes the place of linseed oil. We farmers in the West are using hundreds of thousands of gallons of cottonseed oil as a substitute for linseed oil, because it is a most excellent ingredient with which to mix paint; but it is not an article of food. Without some lubricant, some substance to go with it, as my colleague [Mr. McCumber] said the other day, it would be a mighty hard article to consume or even to swallow.

Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. Dillingham] said yesterday, there are 32 States in the Union which have passed laws regulating the sale or coloring of oleomargarine. I have a list of the different States which have passed legislation on the subject and their laws regarding it, but I shall not trespass upon the time of the Senate to read them. I, however, desire to ask permission to have them printed in the Record in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following compilation of the substance of the dairy laws of the United States was published by the Agricultural Department under the seal of Secretary Wilson a year ago, and copies of the laws in full may be had from the Secretary of Agriculture:

ALABAMA-ANTICOLOR LAW. [Approved Feb. 18, 1895.]

No article which is in imitation of pure yellow butter, and is not made wholly from pure milk and cream, shall be manufactured, sold, or used in any public eating place, hospital, or penal institution, etc; but oleomargarine, free from color or other ingredient to cause it to look like butter, and made in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, is permitted. It must be stamped with its name. ARIZONA.

No dairy laws.

ARKANSAS-MUST BE LABELED.

[Approved Apr. 2, 1885.]

Substitutes for butter, whether in wholesale or retail packages, shall be plainly labeled "Adulterated butter," "Oleomargarine," or such other names as shall properly describe them. In hotels, etc., dishes containing said articles must be plainly marked in same manner.

Mr. GRONNA. Now, Mr. President, what is oleomargarine? I read from the House hearings in 1910, on page 171, a statement made by Mr. Henry C. Pirrung, president of the Capital State Dairy Co., of Columbus, Ohio, a gentleman who admits that for many years he has been engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine. I want to read a brief statement made by him:

Mr. Pirrunc, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in order to perhaps more forcibly illustrate the factory conditions existing in the manufacture of oleomargarine to-day, it will be necessary to state the reason why the present conditions are in force and in existence. It might seem to this committee and to those interested that perhaps my explanation of the factory and its conditions and the manufacture of oleomargarine may be exaggerated, but I assure you, gentlemen, that no exaggeration will be attempted and no departure from the truth truth.

We have known for many years, Mr. President, that certain Senators are not interested in the welfare of the farmer. It is nothing new; it is the same old story. The farmer is a splendid citizen just before election, but subsequent to election he is often forgotten.

often forgotten.

Mr. Hawley. Are you a manufacturer of oleomargarine?

Mr. Pirrung. I am, and have been for 22 years—a practical manufacturer. Years ago—we will say in 1884, 1885, and 1886—when the first law was attempted and enacted the cry by the opponents of oleomargarine was the debasement of materials, the inferior materials we used, the slovenly methods of manufacture; in fact, everything, even fraud was charged at that time. Prominent amongst the illustrative papers was the Police Gazette, which at that time had large pictures showing the dead animals that were used in the manufacture of oleomargarine. It was also stated and illustrated that skimnings of sewer drops in New York were used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, that the basic materials came from the garbage can, and every other vile and putrid matter that could be used. Now, of course, in that sense we must also state that the opponents of oleomargarine stated that this product manufactured from all these materials, which they only charged and never proved were used, was made in imitation of butter and to take the place of butter, and therefore they wanted it distinguished from butter.

Mr. Pirrung goes on to describe what "neutral" is, and I have

Mr. Pirrung goes on to describe what "neutral" is, and I have some extracts marked here, which I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Chairman, Will you tell us what neutral is? You used the term "neutral." Will you tell us what it is, so that we may understand what you refer to?

Mr. Pirbung. Yes; neutral is the oil product of the leaf of the pig. The leaf of the pig is first chilled and then it is hashed or cut into cubes of about an inch or 2 inches. The purpose of chilling, as you will understand, is so that it may be cut into cubes. It is then melted in its cubed condition and brought to a temperature of about 180 to 190 degrees. During the melting process the agitator stirs this neutral continuously in order to bring about the proper melting of the oil from the tissue and fiber. Then it is allowed to stand for a few minutes, and a shower bath of salt is hastily sprinkled over this in order to carry the tissue and fiber and extraneous matter to the bottom, whereon the pure oil of the pig remains on the top. It is then siphoned from the kettle and put into tierces and shipped out for the manufacture of oleomargarine, and thereby the name of "neutral" is attached to it, distinguishing it from the other products of the hog commonly known as lard. as lard.

[From statement of Mr. Thomas Sharpless, president of the Pennsylvania Butter Protective Association.]

In my position, in connection with the Butter Protective Association of Pennsylvania, I have found that 85 per cent of all the samples bought—and they were bought as butter—upon analysis were proved to be oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter.

Mr. GRONNA. Later on I find in these same hearings the statement of a certain gentleman who thinks we ought to abolish the cow; that we ought to do away with the dairy interests entirely. Those of us who are engaged in dairying have not been so uncharitable as that toward the men who are manufacturing oleomargarine. We are anxious to have the products which go into the making of oleomargarine manufactured, and, if no fraud or deception is practiced, we find no fault with the industry; but I, for one, do find fault with the practice of perpetrating fraud and deception upon the consumer. Not only are you proposing to tax a product which you say is a food product and a necessity in order to sustain life, but you tell me you are and a necessity in order to sustain the, but you ten by you are going to make it cheaper and easier for the poor man to obtain it by levying a tax upon it. I think you are also going to make it possible for the seller of this product to get an unfair price for it. It is absolutely certain that an unfair price will be asked if we are to permit this deception and fraud to go on. Instead of benefiting the laboring man, the provision in this bill will result to his detriment. The laboring man ought to be in a position to buy as good butter as you and I. If the conditions in our country are such that the laboring man can not afford to buy butter there is something wrong with our policies; there is something wrong with our country; there is something wrong with the fundamental principles of our Government. Let us change those principles and make it possible for these men to get the wholesome food that you and I get.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of this important subject to delay a vote upon the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. This question is not a new one; it has been before Congress for more than a quarter of a century. The plan proposed by the Senator from Alabama is not a new one. If his amendment should be adopted it would be reenacting the old law; and under that old law the maximum amount collected as revenue was two million four hundred and some odd thousand dollars. I think the majority have failed in their estimate as to the revenue to be derived from this article under the amendment, just as they failed when they wrote their tariff law, which we were told was going to cheapen the food of the American people, lower the cost of living to the American people, and still bring sufficient revenue to pay the running expenses of the Government. Well, you succeeded admirably in failing in both. Food products have advanced—due to the war; of course it was not due to the Democratic tariff law-and the revenues have decreased, so that the Treasury to-day is bankrupt. So it is said that this is an emergency measure, and that it is necessary to take an inferior article, which is claimed to be good enough for the laboring man of this country, and tax him 2 cents a pound, and then foster a gigantic trust in opposition to the millions of farmers who are engaged in the legitimate dairy industry.

Mr. President, I am sorry that I have to say these things to my friends on the other side—and I have many dear friends on the other side of the Chamber—but, like the parent who chastises the son, it is because I want to set you right that I am calling your attention to these matters. It is not because I dislike you; but you have failed in every attempt you have made to legislate for the American people; in every effort you have made to legislate for the laboring man you have made a dismal failure.

Suppose that we should enact a law permitting cotton two grades below medium to be mixed with medium, would you consider that desirable legislation for the South? Yet the mixture would be all cotton, although it would not be medium cotton. do not care whether it is in the South or in the North, the great agricultural industry is entitled to protection. We have helped you when you asked us for help and established standards for great product of the South. Nine grades have been established, four below and four above medium; and if the proposition were here before us now to repeal that law or to change that standard, I should be one of the first to vote against it, because I know it would be doing an injustice to the cotton producer of the South.

Mr. President, what is margarin, anyway? Well, I looked it up in the dictionary, and I find that the word "margarin" is defined as A fatty substance extracted from animal fats mixed with certain vegetable oils, formerly supposed to be a definite compound of glycerin and margaric acid, but now known to be simply a mixture of tristearin and tripalmitin.

Now, I find no fault at all with that description; but, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] said the other day-and I would as soon take his judgment as that of any chemist in this country-stearin is not a food product. I know it is a valuable product. I know that when I was running a thrashing machine, when I was a boy, I used stearin to put on the belts in order to keep them from slipping, and I presume it acts the same way in a person's stomach. It will stay there for a good, long while. It will keep the appetite from slipping, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] says. Why, of course, any of these great corporations would gladly recommend this food product in the lumber camps and in other camps, because it is a product that will stay by you. We sometimes used soap to prevent the belt from slipping on the pulley, but stearin is the real thing; and I am calling attention to this because the Senator from Oregon, in describing this great product, said it was good to grease your boots with, but that it was not good to be used in making the old-fashioned tallow candles.

Mr. President, I know that those of you who favor this amendment are sincere in your belief. I do not question the motives of any Senator or of any other man. Undoubtedly you believe that this legislation will be beneficial to the American people; otherwise, I can not conceive that you would ask us to pass it. But I can not understand how you can justify your position in placing a tax of 2 cents a pound upon a food product which you say is a necessity, and compel these laboring men, for whom we always legislate, for whom we always pass beneficial legislation, as has been said, to pay that tax. You know that you are not benefiting the laboring man by taxing this product 2 cents a pound. You must also know that you make it possible for an unwarranted price to be charged by the men who control this product—and a few peo-ple in the United States control it. No man will deny that. Less than half a dozen men in this country control the product. It is an absolutely trust-controlled product. You make it possible, I say, for that trust to profit unduly, to get an unwarranted price for this article which you say is good enough for the laboring man. I do not think it is good enough for the laboring man. I want you to make conditions such that it is possible for the great dairy interests of this country to produce butter at a reasonable price so that every man, woman, and child in this country can afford to buy butter and to eat butter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The laboring man can get it now. Mr. GRONNA. As the Senator from Michigan says, the laboring man can get it now, as oleomargarine, at an £dditional cost of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound, and the consumer knows what he is buying if he buys it as uncolored oleo-margarine. There is no deception and no fraud practiced upon the laboring man or upon the consumer if he buys the real article.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Many men buy it. I know of Senators in this body who buy it for their own tables because it is

Mr. GRONNA. I am perfectly willing to take this onefourth of 1 cent per pound off. I am perfectly willing that eleomargarine shall be sold to the public absolutely without any tax at all.

Mr. CLAPP. That is, uncolored.
Mr. GRONNA. Uncolored, certainly; but I do not care what the tax is, it is still a deception and a fraud upon the consumer of this country when it is colored. I, for one, would be willing to enact a law absolutely prohibiting the coloring of oleomargarine, the same as they have done in France years ago, and in other European countries.

Now, I have made some pretty serious charges against some of these people who attack the dairy industry. I said before the recess that a third of the lard sold by the American manufacturers was adulterated during the years 1880 to 1890, and I am going to substantiate what I said a moment ago. from the Encyclopaedia Britannica, volume 1, page 232:

from the Encyclopaedia Britannica, volume 1, page 232:

Lard: Between the years 1880 and 1890 a gigantic fraudulent trade in adulterated lard was carried on from the United States. A great proportion of the American lard imported into England was found to consist of a mixture of more or less real lard with cottonseed oil and beef stearline. Cottonseed oil is one of the cheapest vegetable oils fit for human consumption, beef stearline the hard residue obtained in the manufacture of oleomargarine after the more fluid fat has been pressed from the beef fat. These mixtures were made so skillfully by large Chicago manufacturers that for some years they escaped detection. A bill introduced in 1888 into the American Senate to stop this imposture directed general attention to the subject, and energetic measures, taken both in America and in England, quickly put an end to it. From the memorial presented in the United States Senate in support of the bill it appeared that in about 1887 the annual production of lard in the States was estimated at 600,000,000 pounds, of which more than 35 per cent—

I said 331 per cent-was adulterated. Compounds were made containing only a small quantity of lard or none at all, yet were sold as "choice refined lard" or under other eulogistic names. Many lard substitutes, chiefly made from cottonseed oil, are still met with, but are most sold in a legitimate manner.

They even extracted oil from maize or corn and mixed it with

Now, Mr. President, I have taken up a great deal more time than I intended, but I could not let some of these statements go unchallenged with reference to this great industry of dairying, an industry so vital not only to the 35,000,000 people who are engaged in it, but to the 100,000,000 consumers in the United

Mr. President, if conditions are such that the food article known as butter is an unwholesome product, then let us treat this industry as fairly as we treated the Beef Trust. Let us provide for a Federal inspection. Let every creamery in the United States be inspected at the cost of the Government of the United States or the people of the United States. We welcome an inspection system. Many of us have stood on this floor asking you to help us secure Federal inspection for our grain, and we certainly do not object to a system of inspection for every creamery that is manufacturing butter within our borders.

Mr. President, the revenue you will derive from this tax will not be enough to help your great deficit. It will add to the burden on the toiling millions in this country, who are always the ones to bear the heavy burden when food products increase in price, because wages do not always increase with the increased cost of living.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I will ask the Senator if it does not strike him that the vice of the situation is not alone in the fact that it will add a burden to taxation of which the Government will get the proceeds-which is bad enough-but in addition to that, through continuing to allow oleomargarine to be colored, by which producers through the final distributers can add largely to the price, because it is an imitation of butter, it will add a large burden to the people which the Government does not get? That is the vice of this thing.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator from Minnesota. He has stated it much more clearly than I could. He is absolutely right in his statement that the tax is only a bagatelle; but by allowing this deception and this fraud to go on, it is made possible for a large addition to be made to the normal price of this product, for which the farmers receive how much? Seven to eight cents a pound, on foot, is all the Beef Trust pays for cattle. That is a good average price. Yet you are going to say by this law: "We will make it possible for the manufacturer of this spurious article, this adulterated article, this inferior article, to charge as much as butter brings." That is the great evil, as the Senator from Minnesota has said.

I would not ordinarily have uttered a single word of criticism about these great industries, because I realize, as you realize, that these men who have amassed their hundreds of millions of dollars in this great enterprise have brought to this country a great business. I am not criticizing them so long as they keep within their own confines, so long as they do not attempt to deceive the American public.

Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, and I hope a majority of the Senate will do likewise. I said a few moments ago that you can not show me a single country where the people live on dairy products where the people are not healthy. You talk about the insanitary conditions of the stable on the farm. Why, Mr. President, I could show you barns and stables by the hundreds and by the thousands that are less odorous than the slaughter-houses of the stockyards. The farmers of this country are mak-ing every possible effort to handle this product in as sanitary and as cleanly a way as it is possible for human beings to do. There may be exceptions, but it is not the rule, I think, that you will find the stables of the farmers in a condition such as was described by the Senator from Alabama the other day.

Mr. President, I feel like apologizing for having taken so much time of the Senate. The people of my State are not as heavily interested in dairying as the farmers are in other States. We are a new country, and we are engaged in the production of cereals, wheat, oats, barley, and seed, such as flax and grass seeds; but, Mr. President, whether North Dakota had a single creamery or not, I know the condition of the dairy farms, at least some of them. I know it is a most important industry and a most legitimate industry.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I shall vote against the amendemnt offered by my good friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood]. I know he is just as sincere in his belief as I am in mine. I know him very well, having served with him in the other body the same as I am serving with him here. He needs no defense; his own record is sufficient. I say to you that the Senator from Alabama and those of you who are going to force this amendment upon the American people are mistaken. It will not bring you the revenue; it will not cheapen the cost of butter nor of oleomargarine. It will increase the price of oleomargarine because, in the first place, you add a 2-cents-a-pound tax, and as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clapp] so well said, you make it possible to practice fraud and deception upon the American consumer and upon the American laboring man, so that he will have to pay this unduly high price.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I can in five minutes' time express my views on the oleomargarine amendment. Thirtyone years ago this Government enacted a law for the purpose of regulating the sale of oleomargarine and fixed a tax of 2 cents per pound. That law was surrounded with as many restrictions of a protective character as are to be found in the present Underwood amendment. Nevertheless the law proved unsatisfactory. It was found that oleomargarine was being palmed off for genuine butter and that every kind of fraud was being worked.

Fifteen years ago the present law was enacted fixing a tax of one quarter of 1 cent per pound upon eleomargarine that is not colored and 10 cents a pound on the colored article. purpose of the law was to prevent the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter, to protect the consumer and also to protect the producer of butter.

It can not be claimed that the proposed change in the law is intended solely as a revenue measure. That is not believed by anybody. If a revenue were desired, the tax would be fixed without regard to the question of color. We would not find the privilege of counterfeiting and imitating butter carefully carried into the revenue proposition. The fact about the matter is, and every man knows it, that this is a plain, bald attempt to permit the packing houses of the country to sell as butter that which is not butter, to counterfelt butter and to fraudulently put it forth upon the public. That is all there is to it. and you may talk about it until you are black in the face and until the cows come home," and that it all there ever will be

We have been passing pure-food laws in this country in order that men may know what they eat, and we have all said that was a good kind of legislation. Let a man eat what he pleases, but let him know what he is eating, and let not some scoundrel counterfeit some article and have people put it into their stomachs, not knowing what they are eating. We have passed a great deal of that kind of legislation. On the heels of it comes the packing house and says, "Allow us at least to counterfeit And now it is proposed that that privilege shall be granted to the packing houses, and, behold, it is done in the name of the poor and the humble. The breakfast table of the laboring man is lugged in here as Exhibit A in the argument of the advocates of the amendment.

I do not care how poor a man may be, he is entitled at least to the poor privilege of knowing that he is eating eleomargarine if that is all he can buy. He is entitled at least to protection against the fraud monger. He is entitled to be shielded against the counterfeiter. He is entitled to know when he sits down at his table and has to eat bull butter to know it is bull butter and not have it sold to him as real dairy butter. This act ought to be entitled "An act to encourage fraud and to render easy the counterfeiting of food products."

Now, mark you, it can not be said that it benefits the poor, because the poor man certainly when he can buy uncolored oleomargarine taxed only one-fourth of a cent a pound will get the oleomargarine cheaper than he will when he must pay a tax of 2 cents a pound and in return enjoy the blessed privilege of having some coloring matter put in it, poisonous or otherwise. The truth is that the man who wants to make oleomargarine intends to sell it not as oleomargarine but as

Oh, but you say it is to be put in a package, and the package to be branded. Yes; but when the butter is served in the is to be branded. hotels and the restaurants ninety-nine times out of one hundred, and in all the grocery stores where the poor man buys, the package is left off, and the oleomargarine is sold as butter.

Now, that is all there is in this case if you talk about it all night. This is a bold, plain proposal to make it easy for a packing house to sell "bull butter" for cow butter; and I use that term properly, because that is what it is known as in the trade.

I do not know what they make the stuff out of. I read a description the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Penrose] put into the Record, and which I assume of course was a correct description. Whatever they make it out of, it is not that product which the human family have regarded as a staple since the days when Abraham gathered his flocks about him. I do not care if all the chemists this side of heaven, living or dead, were to certify to me that a combination of tallow, lard, cottonseed oil, and other products is better than the natural product of that fluid that all members of the human family began life on, that they have used through all the ages-if anybody tells me these chemical compounds are as good as that thing the Lord produced in the chemistry of nature, I do not believe it. At least I insist that the consumer shall know what he is having, and that nobody has any right by law to sanction the counterfeiting of a food product any more than he has to sanction the counterfeiting of the coin of the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words concerning this oleomargarine amendment which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Gronna] have been discussing. The advocates of this amendment in seeking to maintain it have felt called upon to make some reflections upon the butter industry either as it exists at creameries or on the individual farm. They have charged that butter was produced under conditions even unsanitary, with the result that the product was unwholesome or unbealthy.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that all danger of an unhealthful food product in butter is, under modern conditions and under the care now exercised in making it, reduced to a minimum and that there is scarcely an article of food of any kind or description more free from deleterious substance or ingredient or unwholesomeness of any kind than the butter that is produced on the farm or at the creamery and sold in the market.

I want briefly to call attention to a few of the Federal statutory provisions in regard to inspection that go to insure a purebutter product. I refer to two or three in the agricultural appropriation bill of the present year, which in these respects, Mr. President, is the same, I understand, as the agricultural bill of a year ago and is now a part of the Federal law.

For inspection and quarantine work, which includes this, "The inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases, and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals," an appropriation for all the items mentioned in the paragraph of $628,280.

It will be remembered, Mr. President, that it was charged that tuberculosis is a disease frequent in milet cows, and that there is danger of the disease being communicated to the con-sumer of the butter from such cows. I call attention to another provision. We have an experiment station over here at Be-A part of the work of the experiment station is the "investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products," and so forth, for which an appropriation of $134,600 is made. I call attention to another provision of this same bill, and it is a part of our present law. "For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated butter, factories, and markets," an appropriation for these distinctive purposes, all relating to the dairy industry, of $378,950.

So, Mr. President, from the Federal standpoint it would seem that pretty careful investigation of the dairy industry and the prevention of diseases among cattle and milk cows is provided

But, Mr. President, we are not limited in these inspections to insure the purity and wholesomeness of butter to what is done or is required to be done under Federal law.

I think nearly all the States of the Union, especially the States of the East, North, and West, have their dairy-inspection laws. I do not know that South Dakota is any exception to the general rule, for I am assuming, and I think it will be found correct, that nearly all these States have statutes something like that which I now read from the Revised Statutes of my State:

SEC. 2873. No person shall keep cows in a crowded or unhealthy condition for the production of milk for market or for sale or exchange, or to be manufactured into articles of butter or cheese, or feed cows on food that produces impure, unhealthy, diseased, or unwholesome milk, nor sell milk to any person or persons, nor deliver milk from diseased cows to any creamery or cheese factory. No person shall manufacture from impure, unhealthy, diseased, or unwholesome milk, or cream from the same, any article of butter or cheese. Whosoever violates the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished as hereinafter provided.

Then, there are further provisions in these statutes which relate to the inspection of creameries, and the law requires that he or they who would operate or run a creamery or cheese factory in the State must procure a license and render their business subject to the inspection of the food and dairy commissioner of the State. That inspection makes two inspections and two reports to the governor of the State each year in regard to these various subjects. Penalties are provided for any violation of the law.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President— Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. When was the law which the Senator from South Dakota has just read enacted?

Mr. STERLING. It was enacted in 1903, and is a part of the Revised Statutes of that year. I read from section 2873 of the Political Code.

Mr. BRADY. And ever since that time the Senator's State has been protecting the dairy interests of the State?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly. There are other very rigorous provisions of the law, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, which I shall not take the time to read. So, Mr. President, we have there this Federal inspection, in the first place; then we have the careful inspection provided for under State law.

Now, what do we have in addition to this official inspection by Federal and by State authorities? We, of course, have the care taken by the farmer himself on his own individual intiative and according to the dictates also of his good common sense, Therefore, under all these wholesome aids and influences, I can not help but think that the danger from an impure butter product is reduced, as I said a while ago, to the very minimum.

I have looked through this Agricultural bill, Mr. President, thinking that I might find something in it relating to the inspection of oleomargarine, but not a line have I been able to find in regard to the inspection of that product, nor do I know of a law on the Federal statute books that requires the inspection of oleomargarine and an investigation into the purity of the various ingredients that enter into that compound.

Mr. President, in these days, when our several States are passing new laws affecting the morals and the safety of the people, we are asking the General Government, as we did in the liquor advertising mailing bill, as we did in the "bone-dry" provision put into the Post Office appropriation bill the other day, to assist the States in carrying out their laws relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors. On the same principle, instead of the Federal Government denying the investigation and the inspection of this food product, oleomargarine, the Federal Government ought to give us ample inspection of it.

Let us glance for a moment, Mr. President, at the economic question involved in this proposed amendment. Whom does it affect, and how many? It vitally affects an industry in which more than 4,500,000 people are engaged, on which they depend, and not alone an industry on which they depend, but upon which the whole country depends. How has this industry been built up in the United States? By hard work, by the exercise of the greatest care and economy. It has been an industry peculiur in itself in the encouragement it has given to the practice of thrift and economy on the part of that great body of producers, farmers and dairymen, engaged in the business.

Mr. President, that industry has been the salvation of certain parts of our great country. Take the States represented by the Senators from Vermont and New Hampshire—Vermont especially, that great dairy State. Under ordinary agricultural operations, such as the raising of grain, those States found that after a while they could not compete with the agriculture of the broader and the richer plains of the West and the Middle West. So, as a last resort, and for their own protection, they entered upon this great industry, which has made their people thrifty and prosperous and has made their States, otherwise comparatively poor, agriculturally speaking, rich and prosperous States.

In turn, Mr. President, this industry has been a boon to the States of the West. I remember how in the years between 1890 and 1900, those fateful years when in my own State we were visited with drought and with crop failure, the farmers were enabled to "stay by" and live by reason of the cooperative creameries established, as they were throughout a great part of our State, especially that part of it east of the Missouri River. Since that time creameries have been established in those sections west of the river. It is an industry peculiarly adapted to the semiarid regions, where you can not, year in and year out, depend upon the raising of crops.

Take the country over—the East and the West; the North and the South—and it has been the one great industry which has enabled the farmer to diversify the operations of the farm and to build upon that principle which alone can make agriculture successful and prosperous, namely, diversity in the industry and products of the farm.

Mr. President, will this amendment reduce the cost of living? Mr. President, will this amendment reduce the cost of living? Much has been said already upon that question. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber] in his able argument, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed], and others have all considered it. Will it reduce the cost of living? Well, let us see. If I remember correctly, about 145,000,000 pounds of uncolored oleomargarine were produced last year or during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916. There was a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent a pound on those 145,000,000 pounds. Increase the tax to 2 cents a pound, and let the tax be added to the price, and the consumers of uncolored oleomargarine throughout the United consumers of uncolored oleomargarine throughout the United States will pay, because of the tax alone, an addition of about $2,500,000 for the oleomargarine they consume.

But that is not all. It is fair, I think, to assume, Mr. President, that in addition to the tax the consumer will pay under this amendment for the colored oleomargarine at least 10 cents a pound more than he is now paying for the uncolored product. I think that is a conservative estimate. Ten cents a pound on 145,000,000 pounds makes $14,500,000. Add that to the $2,500,000 paid on account of the tax and we have $17,000,000 added to the cost of that quantity of oleomargarine. That is the fax, the additional burden, you would impose upon the people who consume the food product, and only $2,500,000, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clapp], goes to the Government. So we have $17,000,000 of tax to the consumers of oleomargarine in the additional price they will pay upon the product, with only two and a half million dollars going to the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, all I have to say, in conclusion, is simply this: That it would be most unjust to put this great and vital in-dustry—the dairy and butter-making industry—in competition with a cheap product, made of cheap ingredients, and which, because of the facilities of the great companies and combinations manufacturing it, is produced at the very minimum of cost.

Is there any interest advocating this so-called Underwood amendment? Yes. The Cottonseed Crushers' Association are advocating it. Think, Mr. President, of the interests aside from this great monopoly that are to be affected, and affected to their detriment, by this proposed law and by the tax which it will impose and the liberties which it will allow in the way of coloring oleomargarine, thus enabling the producers thereof to perpetrate this great fraud upon the public. Yes: there is one other interest

The great Beef Trust, the National Live Stock Association, is the other interest advocating this amendment, that interest which can take the by-products from the slaughterhouse and pen and manufacture them into oleomargarine with such extraordinary facility as to produce the article, as I said a moment ago, at the lowest possible cost.

Is there any other interest? There is no other interest, Mr. President, unless it be the authorities that have in hand the collection of the tax, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and, if I remember correctly the reading of certain communications from those distinguished gentlemen, they base their argument for this provision on the ground of their individual convenience more than anything else, or the convenience of the Internal-Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department. I do not believe, Mr. President, that the interests of 4,500,000 people engaged directly in the dairy industry. I do not believe that the interests of the people of the whole country. I do not believe the interests of those who want a cheap but pure food product should be rendered subordinate to the mere convenience of the Treasury Department in collecting this tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Martin, Va. Martine, N. J. Myers Notris Overman Page Penrose Pittman Hollis Hughes Husting Johnson, S. Dak. Jones Ashurst Beckham Brady Brandegee Simmons Smoot Bryan Chilton Clapp Colt Sterling Kenyon Kern La Follette Stone Thomas Thompson La Fonerte Lane Lea, Tenn. Lec, Md. Lewis Lodge McCumber Vardaman Wadsworth Walsh Warren Cummins Poindexter Pomerene Reed Robinson Curtis Dillingham Fall Fletcher Shafroth Sheppard Sherman Gronna Hitchcock McLean

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. Watson] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the rest of the evening.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] is absent on account of illness, and that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. Saulsbury] is detained by illness.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger]. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to have printed in the Record certain telegrams that have come to me in the form of petitions. I ask that the first 2 may go into the RECORD in full, and that as to the 11 that follow, as they are all alike, the names of the signers of the telegrams may be noted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that certain telegrams be incorporated in the RECORD, and that two thereof be printed in full. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The telegrams are as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 23, 1917.

Hon. F. E. Warren,

Connecticut Apartments, Washington, D. C.:

We will appreciate your good offices in securing the passage of a joint resolution giving from six months to a year before the Reed bill will take effect. Local merchants should have an opportunity to dispose of their stock of goods, and, in the spirit of fairness, we believe the proposition should be met half way.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 23, 1917.

Senator Francis E. Warren, Washington, D. C .:

Please aid in securing passage of a joint resolution allowing six months' or a year's time before the Reed law takes effect.

CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK.

Telegrams from the following firms and citizens in Cheyenne, Wyo.: The Wyoming Commercial Co., R. Myers, R. R. Dodge & Co., The Albany Liquor Co., Charles Becker, The Trailmer Co., The Capital Cafe Co., The P. Schoenhofen Brewing Co., Idelman Bros. Co., Davis Mercantile Co., and The Tivoli Mercantile Co.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent at this time to offer an amendment to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783) and ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending revenue bill (H. R. 20573), which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment relieving the Navasota Transfer Co. from further performance of its contracts with the Government, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment providing for the payment of the transportation and traveling expenses of certain rifle teams to the national matches at the State Camp, Florida, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION-CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 720).

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I present a conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill, which I ask may be printed, as we will not be ready to take action upon it this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 10, 14, 21, 24, 26, 29, 30, 44, 45, 48, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 75, 76, 77, 79, 82,

and 84.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 7, 9, 12, 16, 17, 18, 20, 22, 25, 34, 35, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 46, 47, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 72, 78, 80, 81, 83, 87, 89, 92, 94, 95, 96, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, and 105, and agree to the same

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "establishment" in said amendment insert a comma and the word "equipment," and strike out "$20,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 9, line 5, strike out "$1,468,740" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,455,240"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 9, line 6, strike out "$1,796,-640" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,783,140"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of "$269,200" Insert "$277,580";

and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the word "equipment" in the Senate amendment strike out the words "and maintenance"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of "$2,604,956" insert $2,613,-

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$3,445,326" insert "$3,555,-326"; and the Senate agree to the same,

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$90,010" insert "$82,510"; and in lieu of "$15,000" insert "$7,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$112,200" insert "$107,-200"; and in lieu of "$14,000" insert "$9,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$2,460,530" insert $2,480,-: and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$3,123,630" insert "$3,143,-

; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the figures "$1,200" in the Senate amendment insert the words "not exceeding"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Transpose the comma and the figures "$66,100," following the Senate amendment, to a position preceding said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same,

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of "$1,814,567" insert "$1,817,-": and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of "$3,261,475" insert "$3,264,-475": and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$5,709,275" insert

$5,712,275"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$2,992,580" insert $2,972,580"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$3,127,660" insert

$3,107,660"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$813.395" insert "$843,-395"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$1,688,575" insert

$1,718,575"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the language "same to be additional to the existing 80 acres now used as a plant-introduction field station," and transfer the paragraph as thus amended to page 24, between lines 18 and 19, of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$139,500" insert "$104,500";

and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with amendment as follows: In lieu of "$160,000" $125,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 93, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$24,581,213" insert "$24,- 679,113"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 97, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$25,831,213" insert "$25,929,113" and strike out the new language added by the Senate amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

(Mr. HAUGEN agrees to this report, with the exception of the Smoot amendment.)

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20573) to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply rise to suggest that the amendment we were considering has been lost track of alto-It is section 401. gether.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As amended?
Mr. SIMMONS. As amended. It relates to the issuance of bonds to pay the Spanish War bonds which fall due the 1st day of I suggest that we go back to that and have a vote on it, and then if Senators desire to continue the discussion of the oleomargarine amendment when it is not before the Senate, of course, they are at liberty to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that we pass over the amendments preceding the oleomargarine amendment, and take up that amendment now and have the discussion finished, and then vote upon it. Then we can return to these other amendments, which I do not think will take very much time. The amendment immediately preceding the oleomargarine amendment will take some little time, but I believe that the Senators who desire to discuss it, or at least some of them, are not here to-night, being unable to be here on account of illness. It seems to me that the best way to proceed would be to pass over the amendments preceding the amendment relating to oleomargarine, take that up now, discuss it, and get through with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I would more than gladly comply with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah but for the fact that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the author of this amendment, is not in the Chamber. I have tried to reach him and notify him that this amendment probably would be reached to-night, but have failed to do so. If I were to pass over other amendments and take up his amendment out of its order, in his absence, I am afraid he would have just cause of complaint.

Mr. SMOOT. There are a number of speeches yet to be made upon that particular subject. Why not get those speeches upon that question back of us now? Then, of course, if it becomes necessary to lay it aside before adjournment, that can

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the opponents of that amendment agree, if it is taken up now for discussion, to fix a time to vote on it to-morrow?

Mr. President, I should be glad personally to do it, but I will say to the Senator that I do not believe that this particular time is the proper time to ask for it. As far as I am concerned, I do not want to say a word upon it. Personally, I am ready to vote upon it now; but I know there are still some Senators who desire to speak upon it. It seems to me that the Senator's suggestion that we were talking about a matter that was not immediately before the Senate was a very proper suggestion to make; and as I know that there are speeches-not long ones, in some cases-which Senators desire to make upon that matter to-night, I made the suggestion that I did.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator that we have a vote on the amendment that is now pending. It has already been amended, and has been discussed; and there is no reason why we should not have a vote on it, I think. Then we will take up the question of whether we will skip over the intervening amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment is section 401?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; section 401.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. Then, Mr. President, I ask that that be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, let there be no misunderstanding about the matter. I intend to submit some observations upon the so-called Underwood amendment. For a long time I have followed the practice of endeavoring, at any rate, to speak on the subject before the Senate, and I prefer that the bill be pursued in its regular order. When that amendment is reached for consideration I intend to be heard for a few minutes upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I knew the Senator felt that way about it, and I am anxious to get that amendment before the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to have the pending amendment stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 62 and agrees to the same, recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 58 and agrees to the same with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, further insists upon its disagreement to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill, requests a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BYRNES of Tennessee, Mr. Sisson, and Mr. Good managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO-CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I submit the conference report on the Porto Rican bill, and ask that it lie on the table and be printed. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will lie on the table and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9533) "to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 13, 14,

15, 16, 19, 21, 25, 35, 36, 39, 42, 43, 81, 82, 90, 91, 92, and 94.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 17, 18, 20, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 34, 37, 38, 41, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 69, 71, 73, 74, 77, 78, 79, 80, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, and 93, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "That all money derived from any tax levied or assessed for a special purpose shall be treated as a special fund in the Treasury and paid out for such purpose only except upon the approval of the President of the United States"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: ", subject to disapproval by the governor if he desires to act"; and the Senate agree to the

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: ", and he shall perform such other duties, not inconsistent with this act, as may be prescribed by ; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "governor, which appeal shall specifically set forth the particular action of the auditor to which exception is taken, with the reason and authorities relied on for reversing such decision. The decision of the governor in such case shall be final, subject to such right of action as may be otherwise provided by law"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: ", and no senator or representative shall, during the time for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office under the Government of Porto Rico, nor be appointed to any office created by act of the legislature during the time for which he shall have been elected until two years after his term of office shall have expired": and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the first regular session of the Legislature of Porto Rico, provided for by this act, shall convene on the twenty-eighth day after the first election provided for herein, and regular sessions of the legislature shall be held biennially thereafter, convening on the second Monday in February of the year 1919, and on the second Monday in February of each second year thereafter."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 68, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and may, in its discretion, from time to time publish the same, and the yeas and nays on any question shall, on the demand of onefifth of the members present, be entered on the journal.

The sessions of each house and of the committees of the whole shall be open.

Neither house shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting.

No law shall be passed except by bill, and no bill shall be so altered or amended on its passage through either house as to change its original purpose.

"No act of the legislature except the general appropriation bills for the expenses of the government shall take effect until 90 days after its passage, unless in case of emergency (which shall be expressed in the preamble or body of the act) the legislature shall by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each house otherwise direct. No bill, except the general appropriation bill for the expenses of the government only, introduced in either house of the legislature after the first 40 days of the session, shall become a law.

No bill shall be considered or become a law unless referred to a committee, returned therefrom, and printed for the use of the members: Provided, That either house may by a majority vote discharge a committee from the consideration of a measure and bring it before the body for consideration.

No bill, except general appropriation bills, shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title; but if any subject shall be embraced in any act which shall not be expressed in the title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be so expressed.

"No law shall be revived, or amended, or the provisions thereof extended or conferred by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revived, amended, extended, or conferred shall be reenacted and published at length.

"The presiding officer of each house shall, in the presence of the house over which he presides, sign all bills and joint resolutions passed by the legislature, after their titles shall have been publicly read, immediately before signing; and the fact of signing shall be entered on the journal. The legislature shall prescribe by law the number, duties, and compensation of the officers and employees of each house; and no payment shall be made for services to the legislature from the treasury, or be in any way authorized to any person, except to an acting officer or employee elected or appointed in pursuance of law.

"No bill shall be passed giving any extra compensation to any public officer, servant or employee, agent or contractor, after services shall have been rendered or contract made.

"Except as otherwise provided in this act, no law shall extend the term of any public officer, or increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment, nor permit any officer or employee to draw compensation for more than one office or position.

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives, but the senate may propose or concur with amendments, as in case of other bills,

"The general appropriation bill shall embrace nothing but appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, interest on the public debt, and schools. All other appropriations shall be made by separate bills, each embracing but one subject.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on the question of adjournment, or relating solely to the transaction of business of the two houses, shall be presented to the governor, and before it shall take effect be approved by him, or being disapproved shall be repassed by two-thirds of both houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill.

"Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, offer, give, or promise any money or thing of value, testimonial, privilege, or personal advantage to any executive or judicial officer or member to influence him in the performance of any of his public or official duties, shall be deemed guilty of bribery, and be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both.

"The offense of corrupt solicitation of members of the legislature, or of public officers of Porto Rico, or of any municipal division thereof, and any occupation or practice of solicitation of such members or officers to influence their official action, shall be defined by law, and shall be punished by fine and imprisonment.

In case the available revenues of Porto Rico for any fiscal year, including available surplus in the insular treasury, are insufficient to meet all the appropriations made by the legislature for such year, such appropriations shall be paid in the following order, unless otherwise directed by the governor: "First class. The ordinary expenses of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the State government, and interest on any public debt shall first be paid in full.

"Second class. Appropriations for all institutions, such as the penitentiary, insane asylum, industrial school, and the like, where the inmates are confined involuntarily, shall next be paid in full.

"Third class. Appropriations for education and educational and charitable institutions shall next be paid in full.

"Fourth class. Appropriations for any other officer or officers, bureaus, or boards shall next be paid in full.

Fifth class. Appropriations for all other purposes shall next be paid.

That in case there are not sufficient revenues for any fiscal year, including available surplus in the insular treasury, to meet in full the appropriations of said year for all of the said classes of appropriations, then said revenues shall be applied to the classes in the order above named, and if, after the payment of the prior classes in full there are not sufficient revenues for any fiscal year to pay in full the appropriations for that year for the next class, then, in that event, whatever there may be to apply on account of appropriations for said class shall be distributed among said appropriations pro rata according as the amount of each appropriation of that class shall bear to the total amount of all of said appropriations for that class for such fiscal year.

"No appropriation shall be made nor any expenditure authorized by the legislature whereby the expenditure of the government of Porto Rico during any fiscal year shall exceed the total revenue then provided for by law and applicable for such appropriation or expenditure, including any available surplus in the treasury, unless the legislature making such appropriation shall provide for levying a sufficient tax to pay such appropriation or expenditure within such fiscal year.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the qualified electors of Porto Rico shall at the next general election choose a Resident Commissioner to the United States, whose term of office shall begin on the date of the issuance of his certificate of election and shall continue until the 4th of March, 1921. At each subsequent election, beginning with the year 1920, the qualified electors of Porto Rico shall choose a Resident Commissioner to the United States, whose term of office shall be four years from the 4th of March following such general election."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: ", but the legislature may consolidate departments or abolish any department with the consent of the President of the United States"; and the Senate agree to the same

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or effect the provision contained in section 3 of the joint resolution approved May 1, 1900, with respect to the buying, selling, or holding of real estate; that the Governor of Porto Rico shall cause to have made and submitted to Congress at the session beginning the 1st Monday in December, 1917, a report of all the real estate used for the purposes of agriculture and held either directly or indirectly by corporations, partnerships, or individuals in holdings in excess of 500 acres.

And the Senate agree to the same. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate strike out all of section 40 in the engrossed bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the enrolling clerk shall renumber the sections of the bill in accordance with this conference report.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS-CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me to have the action of the House of Representatives on the legislative bill (H. R. 18542) laid before the Senate? Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate fur-ther insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the same conferees to be appointed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the parliamentarian at the desk that the Senate can not act upon a House report in this form.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not understand the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the legislative appropriation bill.

The SECRETARY:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES, February 23, 1917.

Resolved, That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62 to the bill (H. R. 18542) entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," and agrees to the same.

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58 and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows:

the Senate numbered 58 and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows:

in lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: ": Provided, That hereafter no Government official or employee shall receive any salary in connection with his services as such an official or employee from any source other than the Government of the United States, except as may be contributed out of the treasury of any State, county, or municipality, unless otherwise authorized by law, and no person, association, or corporation shall make any contribution to, or in any way supplement the salary of, any Government official or employee for the services performed by him for the Government of the United States, unless otherwise authorized by law. Any person violating any of the terms of this proviso shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 or imprisonment for not less than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment as the court may determine."

That the House further insists upon its disagreement to the other amendments of the Senate to said bill and asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. Brans of Tennessee, Mr. Sisson, and Mr. Good by the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate agree to the conference asked for by the House, further insist on its amendments in disagreement, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This report has not yet been printed, has it?

Mr. OVERMAN. No. I do not ask for its consideration now, however.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina was to agree to the partial report.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; this is a request for a further conference. The House rejected the report and asked for another I move that the Senate agree to the further conconference. ference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees

Mr. POINDEXTER. I misunderstood the Senator's motion. I understood the Senator to be submitting a partial report and asking for a further conference.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the whole matter goes back to con-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments, grant the further conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. Overman, Mr. Bryan, and Mr. Smoot conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I present the conference report on the legislative, and so forth, appropriation bill, and ask that it lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will be received and printed in the RECORD.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 23, 24, 25, 32, 33, 34, 37, 38, 39, 42, 43, 44, 51, 53, 55, 59, 61, 69, and 70.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 21, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 35, 36, 40, 41, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 54, 56, 57, 60, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, and 71, and agree to

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Senate resolutions Nos. 561, Sixty-third Congress, third session, and 101, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate the methods of examining and auditing claims against the United States and accounts of disbursing officers, and of accounting for receipts and disbursements and shall submit a report to the Secretary of the Treasury and to Congress, with recommendations, at its next regular session.

"The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate the work performed by the Subtreasuries and report to the Secretary of the Treasury and to Congress at the beginning of the next regular session what part of the work of the Subtreasuries may be transferred to other offices of the Government, banks of the Federal Reserve System, or farm-loan banks, and for the purpose of this investigation the representatives of the Bureau of Efficiency shall have access to all necessary books and other records of the Government.

"The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate the methods of transacting the public business in the Civil Service Commission and report to Congress through the President at the next regular session of Congress. The officers and employees of the Civil Service Commission are hereby directed to furnish said bureau with such information as it may require to carry out this pro-

"The Bureau of Efficiency shall ascertain the rates of pay of employees of various State and municipal governments and commercial institutions in different parts of the United States, and shall submit to Congress at its next regular session a report showing how such rates compare with the rates of pay of employees of the Federal Government performing similar services.

"Officers and employees of the executive departments and other establishments shall furnish authorized representatives of the Bureau of Efficiency with all information that the bureau may require for the performance of the duties imposed on it by law, and shall give such representatives access to all records and papers that may be needed for that purpose."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "Departments," insert the following: "and independent establishments of the Government"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For employees now paid from appropriation for emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, $4,140"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Federal Farm Loan Bureau: For four members of the board, at $10,000 each; secretary to the board, $4,500; chief, bond division, $3,000; 4 private secretaries, at $2,000 each; clerks-1 of class 4, 1 $900. 3 at $720 each, 1 $600; clerk and stenographer, $1,200; stenographers--7 at $1,000 each, 4 at $900 each, 3 at $720 each; messenger; and 3 assistant messengers; in all, $77,920.

"For salaries and expenses under the Federal Farm Loan Board created by the act approved July 17, 1916, including the actual necessary traveling expenses of the members of the board and such salaries, fees, and expenses as are authorized by said act, including farm-loan registrars, examiners, and such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, laborers, and other employees in the District of Columbia and elsewhere as the Federal Farm Loan Board may find necessary, $182,080; in all, $260,000. A detailed statement of expenditures hereunder shall be made to Congress.

"Estimates in detail for all expenditures under the Federal Farm Loan Bureau for the fiscal year 1919, and annually thereafter, shall be submitted to Congress in the annual Book of Estimates.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and in lieu of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment, insert the following: ": Provided, That on and after July 1, 1919, no Government official or employee shall receive any salary in connection with his services as such an official or employee from any source other than the Government of the United States, except as may be contributed out of the treasury of any State, county, or municipality, and no person, association, or corporation shall make any contribution to, or in any way supplement the salary of, any Government official or employee for the services performed by him for the Government of the United States. Any person violating any of the terms of this proviso shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 or imprisonment for not less than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment as the court may determine"; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Sec. 8. The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate duplication of service in the various executive departments and establishments." lishments of the Government, including bureaus and divisions, and make a report to the President thereon, and the President is hereby authorized, after such report shall have been made to him, wherever he finds such duplications to exist to abolish the same. Report of the action taken hereunder shall be made to Congress at its next regular session.

And the Senate agree to the same.

The Secretary. On page 11, after line 4, the committee proposes to insert a new section, as follows:

Sec. 401. That the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States a sum not exceeding $63,945,460 and to prepare and issue therefor bonds of the United States, the proceeds of such bonds to be applied to the redemption on August 1, 1918, of the bonds of the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918 authorized by the act approved June 13, 1898, and then maturing, such proceeds to be applied to no other purpose: Provided, That in his discretion the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury prior to August 1, 1918, any of the bonds of the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918 maturing on such date and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of bonds of the United States herein authorized: Provided further, That the bonds herein authorized shall be in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, redeemable and payable at such times within 50 years from date of issue as the Secretary may direct, bearing interest payable quarterly at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, and the bonds herein authorized shall be payable, principal and interest, in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and both principal and interest shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and said bonds shall not be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks: Provided further, That said bonds may be disposed of by sale or exchange by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, and in case of sale all citizens of the United States shall be given an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor, but no commissions shall be allowed or paid thereon, and a sum not exceeding one-fith of 1 per cent of the amount of

It has It amended the con-The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has. It amended the committee amendment accordingly.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to make an inquiry. stand exactly the committee amendment which has been amended since the bill was presented, whether it was made mandatory for the Secretary of the Treasury to issue these bonds in serial form or

Mr. SIMMONS. Permissive only. Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he does not think that the Senate should take positive action in this matter and require that the Government bonds issued hereafter should be issued in serial form.

Mr. SIMMONS. One difficulty, I imagine, would be the market value of these short-term bonds as compared with the market value of longer term bonds.

Mr. WEEKS. I have made very careful inquiry among bond men who are thoroughly conversant with the market for bonds of all kinds, and it is the universal opinion that a serial bond under present conditions sells as readily and at as high a price as a sinking-fund bond or any other bond.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I might with propriety state that in a conversation I recently had with the Secretary of the Treasury he expressed to me the opinion that it would be difficult to float at this time a short-term bond as low as 3 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. I am quite in agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury on that proposition. I think it would be difficult to float any considerable issue of bonds on a 3 per cent basis. If we were actually in a state of war I have no doubt that the patriotic sentiment would be such that any rate which the Gov-ernment wished to place on its bonds would bring about a flotation of a considerable issue, but it is below the market rate for bonds to-day. Not very long ago the State of Massachusetts, which has excellent credit, as the Senator knows, issued, I think, five or ten million dollars of 4 per cent bonds that sold on only a 3.9 per cent basis. They were retailed on about a 3.7 basis. Since that time, since the breaking of relations with Germany, municipal and State and governmental bonds have increased in the rate of interest which they carry from one-tenth to one-fourth of 1 per cent. So I think it will be fair to say that the very best bonds issued by our State would not sell on a much better than 4 per cent basis, if any. Under those circumstances I do not think a Government bond which has not the privilege of issuing circulation against it would sell much better than on a 3½ per cent basis.

I think that if any issue of bonds is to be made it should bear 31 per cent interest, and then it will sell at a sufficient premium to make the net rate which it would bear a fair market rate. I am afraid that a 3 per cent rate will not go, and it would be a great misfortune for the Government to attempt to sell bonds and not have them all taken.

It is possible, of course, that this issue of $63,000,000 might sell on a 3 per cent basis, but it certainly would not sell unless the bonds carried a provision which would enable those who bought the bonds to refund them on the same basis that future bought the bonds to rerund them on the same basis that turbe issues might be made; that is to say, we are almost sure to make other issues; in fact, this bill provides for issuing more bonds; and if we could sell this issue of $63,000,000 on a 3 per cent basis it would be necessary to give the privilege to those who buy the bonds to refund them on a 31 per cent basis, or whatever basis future issues are sold upon.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree with the Senator about that; and I think that would be a very good provision.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to say to the Senator that I have included paragraph 401 in the substitute which I have offered to the bill. If the Senator insists on taking it up now, I should like to have time enough to prepare an amendment which would cover what I think are very safe restrictions relating to an issue of bonds of this kind.

This paragraph itself, Mr. President, illustrates the carelessness and unbusinesslike way in which we have been handling our Government indebtedness. These were Spanish War bonds. They should have been retired within 20 years-that is, by next year-and yet we made no provision for their retirement, and now the proposition which came in here from the commit-tee provides that they shall be refunded for 50 years. It is perfectly ridiculous from any business standpoint to issue Spanish War bonds running for 20 years and then refund them for 50 years, making the Spanish War debt last 70 years. That ought not to be done. I hope the Senator will be willing to allow this to be passed and let me prepare the amendment. These bonds have been redeemable ever since 1908, I understand, but the Government has not redeemed them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that I am sure the Secretary of the Treasury is under the impression that he would not at this time have any serious difficulty in floating these bonds at 3 per cent. I am sure he also feels that he could not float a short-term bond at that rate. I think, however, if the amendment the Senator suggests allowing them hereafter to be taken up when a higher rate bond is issued, provided the market of other bonds should be increased, helps the situation very much. If the Senator desires until tomorrow to prepare the amendment and will then offer it I have no objection to letting the matter go over.

Mr. WEEKS. I think it would be along the line of good legislation if that were done.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to letting the amendment go over until to-morrow in order to give the Senator from Massachusetts time to prepare his amendment.
Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.
Mr. SHERMAN. I will take up the section just read.
Mr. SIMMONS. That, however, goes over at the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, if the Senator understood my statement.

my statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. That it go over in the hope of attaching the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; but I wish to apply myself to some other features of the amendment, not only those referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts but some of the general aspects of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair).

The Chair desires to make an inquiry. Is there a mutual agreement that the Senate shall recess at 11 o'clock?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President; there is none, but I will move that the Senate take a recess

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer two amendments to the bill

(H. R. 20573), to be printed. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and lie on the table and be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock p. m., Friday, February 23, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, February 24, 1917, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 23, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, arouse within us the holy spirit of truth that we may think clearly, do justly, and follow the dictates of conscience in the abnormal conditions which confront us, arising out of the widespread clash of arms around us; that we may quit ourselves like men and leave behind us a record which we can look back upon with just pride; and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the location of the armor-plate plant.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for permission to extend my remarks very briefly on the subject of making the days longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a short editorial from the Washington Post this morning advising the people to go slow on war; also one from the Akron Beacon-Journal, which suggests the mobilization of the editors of the country for fighting purposes. [Laughter.]
The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none,

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by presenting a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Washington in regard to preparedness and to extend remarks on other subjects in connection therewith.

Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 8126. An act to extend the time for the cutting of timber on the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests in Arizona; and

S. 7710. An act to amend the irrigation act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 1095), section 18, and to amend section 2 of the act of May 11, 1898 (30 Stats., p. 404).

CONFERENCE REPORT, PAYMENT OF FINDINGS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill S. 1878.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 1878. An act making appropriations for payment of certain claims in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the report was read on yesterday, and I would ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 19937, of same title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1539).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19937) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 9,

27, 36, 43, and 49.

ISAAC R. SHERWOOD. Jos. J. Russell, Jno. W. Langley, Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did the House ask for the conferences?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The House asked for a conference in two cases and the Senate in the last case. The next case the Senate asked for a conference.

Mr. MANN. This one now pending? This is a House bill with Senate amendments, and I take it the Senate asked for a conference

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The House bill with Senate amendments. We asked in the last case for conferees so as to expedite the time, and the clerk of the Senate committee told me the committee said for us to go ahead and put all through at once.

Mr. MANN. I know; but the clerk of a Senate committee is not the man who regulates the parliamentary procedure by a long shot.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I understand; but it has been done sometimes, and I thought there would be no objection to it. I am not going to object to it, but the House Mr. MANN.

that agrees to the conference ought to act on it first.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The third case is H. R. 20451. In that case the Senate asked for the conference and we agreed

Mr. MANN. It is very bad practice and mixes everybody up, and nobody can keep track of the thing easily, much less the clerks, unless we follow the established practice. Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will not object. I want to get them through and in the hands of the enrolling clerk.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to object. It will not take any longer for the Senate to act first.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. We would have to take the matter up here, and it would cause some little delay

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 20451, of similar title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report, The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1538).

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is that all of the pension bills?
Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. That is all of the conference reports. There are two Senate bills here.

The SPEAKER. I know; but you can not get them up now.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. That is what I thought.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN NATIONAL PARKS, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 4862, an act to exclude intoxicating liquors from national parks and national forest reserves, and ask that it be placed before the House for consideration, a similar bill (H. R. 6814) being on the calendar

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for the time being. He will have plenty of op-

mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman who has made Milwaukee famous that I withdrew it yesterday on his request.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recognize that. I had an understanding with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris], the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, who reported this bill, that he would not bring it up until there was a large membership in the House, and I had his assurance to that effect.

Mr. RANDALL. The Record does not show that any such agreement was made.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was a private understanding had with the gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from Wisconsin after the matter was withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Wisconsin requested that it be withdrawn yesterday on account of the exercises on Washington's Birthday. Now that is over, and the session of Congress will soon be over.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill S. 4862.

During the reading,
Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a point of order in due season about the bill not being of right before the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. What is the trouble with it?
Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will hear me, first, Mr. Speaker,
I make the point of order that there has not been a House bill of substantially the same character favorably reported by a committee of the House. Next, I make the point of order that the Committee on the Public Lands has not by motion directed that this Senate bill be taken from the Speaker's table and considered, as required under section 2 of Rule XXIV.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Chair overrules the first point of order and will hear the gentleman on the second point.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a question of fact. I will ask any member of the Committee on the Public Lands, the chairman of the committee not being here, if any action has been taken by that committee authorizing the gentleman from California to bring up this bill and take it from the Speaker's table. Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. STAFFORD. I yield. Mr. RANDALL. The chairman himself called up the bill yesterday, and the author of the bill-

Mr. STAFFORD. There has been no action taken, Mr. Speaker, and the gentleman virtually admits it, authorizing the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] to bring up this bill and take it from the Speaker's table. The rule is clear that it is one of the express conditions before a bill can be taken from the Speaker's table that the committee which has acted upon a bill substantially the same has authorized the person to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. There is no question in the world about that rule. Now, the Chair will ask the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] whether the Committee on Public Lands authorized him to call this bill up?

Mr. RANDALL. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has so authorized me.

The SPEAKER, I know; but the chairman can not do that. The Chair will render his opinion after investigating thoroughly the rulings in the Sixty-second Congress. It takes an actual meeting of the committee. It can not be done even by getting a majority of the committee to sign. And if the committee did not authorize it, the point of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] is well taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the indulgence of the Chair before he rules on the first point of order, that the matter go over, and that he grant me the privilege to be heard on that

The SPEAKER. Let the matter go over, and the Chair will get the two bills. The Chair is proceeding on the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] that these two bills are practically the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are not.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 18894. An act to amend the public-building act approved March 4, 1913, authorizing the acquisition of a suitable site for a public building at Pittston, Pa.; and

H. R. 16855. An act for the relief of Riverside Military Academy.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 19300. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918;

H. R. 19937. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 18181. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of the soldiers and sailors of said war.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 201. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to designate and appoint a day on which funds may be raised for the relief of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians); S. 8252. An act to authorize the change of name of the steamer Charles L. Hutchinson to Fayette Brown; and S. 7601. An act for the relief of Caleb T. Holland.

BILLS STRICKEN FROM CALENDAR.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, there are four bills on the Private Calendar that have been taken care of in other legislation. Therefore, I desire to ask unanimous consent that these bills be stricken from the calendar and lie on the table. I send a list of them to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the annotations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Private bills to be stricken from the Private Calendar:
Calendar No. 251 (H. R. 13636) for the relief of R. L. Jennings.
Calendar No. 256 (S. 606) for the relief of James C. Hilton.
Calendar No. 535 (S. 4368) for the relief of D. A. Barbour and Andrew P. Gladden.
Calendar No. 544 (S. 5768) for the relief of Frank Carpenter.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the bills should be left hanging between heaven and earth. The gentleman ought to ask unanimous consent that they be laid on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. That was my request. I first said "Speaker's table," and then suggested that they be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these bills will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk rend the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the accompanying statement be read in lieu of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, nobody will listen to it anyhow. The statement is longer than the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws the request. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1540).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 5, 23, 24, 25, 32, 33, 34, 37, 38, 39, 42, 43, 44, 51, 53, 55, 59, 61, 69,

and 70.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 35, 36, 40, 41, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 54, 56, 57, 60, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, and 68, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Senate resolutions numbered 561, Sixty-third Congress, third session, and 101, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, are hereby repealed"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Amend the matter inserted by said amendment as follows: In line 10, strike out the word "or" and in lieu thereof insert a comma (,); in the same line, after the word "System," insert "or farm loan banks." In line 16, strike out the word "Senate" farm loan banks." In line 16, strike out the word "Senate" and in lieu thereof insert "Congress." In line 20, strike out the word "resolution" and in lieu thereof insert "provision";

and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "departments," insert the following: "and independent establishments of the Government"; and the Senate agree to the Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For employees now paid from appropriation for emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, $4,140"; and the Senat agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: ": Provided, That hereafter no Government official or employee shall receive any salary in connection with his services as such an official or employee from any source other than the Government of the United States, except as may be contributed out of the treasury of any State, county, or municipality, and no person, association, or corporation shall make any contribution to, or in any way supplement the salary of, any Government official or employee for the services performed by him for the Government of the United States. Any person violat-ing any of the terms of this proviso shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 or imprisonment for not less than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment as the court may determine"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 62: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following

"In order to promote economy in the distribution of supplies and in auditing and accounting, the Postmaster General may hereafter designate districts and central offices in such districts through which supplies shall be distributed and accounts ren-dered and may establish such branch offices within such dis-tricts as he may deem necessary; but in no case shall the postmaster at the central office be given authority to abolish offices, to change officers or employees in offices included in such districts: Provided, That any district established hereunder shall not extend beyond a county except in cities lying within two or more counties."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following

"Sec. 8. The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate duplica-tion of service in the various executive departments and establishments of the Government, including bureaus and divisions, and make a report to the President thereon, and the President is hereby authorized, after such report shall have been made to him, wherever he finds such duplications to exist to abolish the Report of the action taken hereunder shall be made to Congress at its next regular session.'

And the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 20, 21, 22, and 71.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely

On Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, relating to the Senate: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate for an additional assistant clerk at $1,440 to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; appropriates $1,800, as proposed by the Senate, for rent of a warehouse for storage of public documents; inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate repealing certain Senate resolutions, modified so as to eliminate from such repeal Senate resolution No. 421, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

On No. 5: Appropriates for clerk hire to Members and Delegates, as proposed by the House, instead of as proposed by the

On Nos. 6, 7, 8, and 9, relating to the Library of Congress: Appropriates $900, as proposed by the Senate, for an assistant in the reading room for the blind; makes the appropriations of $1,400 for waterproofing parts of the east driveway and $1,075 for fire hose and fittings "immediately available," as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 10: Makes the appropriation of $12,000 for the Botanical Garden available for the purchase of "office equipment," as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 11, 12, and 13, relating to the Bureau of Efficiency: Appropriates $60,000. as proposed by the Senate, instead of $43,000, as proposed by the House; inserts the paragraphs, proposed by the Senate, for an investigation by the Bureau of Efficiency of auditing and examining claims and the accounts of disbursing officers, an investigation of the work performed by the Subtreasuries, an investigation of the methods of transacting public business in the Civil Service Commission, an investigation of the rates of pay of employees of State and municipal governments and commercial institutions as compared with rates of pay of the Federal Government for similar services, an investigation of the classification, salary, and efficiency of Government employees in the District of Columbia; and requires officers and employees of the Government to furnish representatives of the bureau with information necessary for the performance of the duties imposed upon it by law.

On No. 14, relating to the Civil Service Commission: Limits the appropriation of $7,500 for field examiners at the rate of $1,500 per annum to five persons, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 15, 16, 17, and 18, relating to the State Department: rovides for a chauffeur at $1,080, and strikes out provision for a driver at $840 and a hostler at $720; appropriates $4,140, as proposed by the Senate, for employees now paid from the appropriation for emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and makes the appropriation of $4,000 for an automobile, for official use of the Secretary of State, immediately available, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 19: Abolishes the branch printing office in the State, War, and Navy Department Building, as proposed by the Senate, On No. 23: Strikes out the appropriation of $250, proposed by the Senate, for law books for the Comptroller of the Treasury.

On Nos. 24 and 25, relating to the Office of the Auditor for the Navy Department: Transfers a clerk of class 3 from the register's office, as proposed by the House, instead of a clerk of class 4, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 26: Provides for an "unapportioned" check assorter at $900, as proposed by the Senate, in the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department.

On Nos. 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31, relating to the Office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department: Appropriates $254,730, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $284,730, as proposed by the House, for compensation of employees auditing accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, and makes permanent, as proposed by the Senate, the authority granted the Secretary of the Treasury to diminish positions as vacancies occur and use the unexpended balances of salaries for the payment of employees in auditing accounts.

On Nos. 32, 33, and 34: Omits a clerk of class 3 in the office of the register, as proposed by the House, instead of one of class 4, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 35 and 36: Appropriates $1,400, as proposed by the Senate, for a private secretary for the captain commandant in the Office of the Coast Guard.

On Nos. 37, 38, and 39: Appropriates $4,500 for the pay of the Chief of the Secret Service Division and $3,500 for the assistant chief, as proposed by the House, instead of $4,000 and $3,000, respectively, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 40 and 41: Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the language relative to per diem in lieu of subsistence in appropriations for collecting internal revenue.

On Nos. 42, 43, and 44: Provides for 61 assistant messengers, as proposed by the House, instead of 40, as proposed by the Senate, in the Office of The Adjutant General, and restores the language, stricken out by the Senate, requiring employees of The Adjutant General's Office to be exclusively engaged on the work of his office during the fiscal year 1918.

On No. 45: Appropriates $5,000, as proposed by the Senate, for a blue-printing plant in the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy Department.

On Nos. 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, and 51, relating to the General Land Office: Provides for two additional clerks at $1,600 each, three additional clerks at $1,400 each, four additional clerks at $1,200 each, and four additional clerks at $1,000 each, as proposed by the Senate; and strikes out the paragraph, inserted by the Senate, authorizing the use of $6,500 of the appropriation for surveying for the current year in the payment of field employees detailed to the General Land Office.

On Nos. 52, 53, 54, and 55, relating to the Pension Office: Strikes out a chief of division at $2,000, as proposed by the Senate; provides for a law clerk at $2,250, as proposed by the House, instead of a chief of the law division at the same salary, as proposed by the Senate; and strikes out the language, inserted by the Senate, modifying the limitation on the filling of vacancies occurring during the fiscal year 1918.

On Nos. 56 and 57, relating to the Patent Office: Appropriates $10,000 for special and temporary services of typewriters to keep current the work of furnishing manuscript copies of records; and inserts authority for the purchase of law books, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 58, relating to the Bureau of Education and the General Education Board: Inserts a substitute for the matter proposed by the Senate which prohibits Government officials and employees from receiving salary as such officials from any source other than the United States Government or State, county, or municipal governments and affixes a penalty for the violation of the act.

On No. 59: Strikes out the appropriations of $20,000 for rent for the Geological Survey and $6,000 for the Bureau of Mines, proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 60, 61, and 62, relating to the Post Office Department: Appropriates for the officers and employees of the Post Office Department in the manner proposed by the Senate, in-stead of in the manner proposed by the House; strikes out the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, placing postmasters in the classified service; inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, relative to central accounting and distributing districts in the Postal Service, modified so as to prevent any district which may be established from extending beyond a county.

On Nos. 63, 64, and 65, relating to the Census Office: Provides for an additional chief statistician, at $3,000, as proposed by the Senate, and appropriates $647,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $512,000, as proposed by the House, for securing information for census reports.

On No. 66: Appropriates $120,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $110,000, as proposed by the House, for contingent expenses of the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

On No. 67: Increases the amount for personal services in Washington that may be used from the appropriation for the enforcement of wireless-communication laws from $7,150 to $8,050, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 68: Reduces the rate per day to be paid to experts and temporary assistants in Children's Bureau from $8 to $6, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 69 and 70, relating to the Court of Claims: Provides for four stenographers, at $1,200 each, as proposed by the House, instead of five stenographers, at $1,200 each, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 72, relating to the section authorizing the President to report upon the coordination of the work of the departments: Inserts a substitute for the Senate amendment requiring the Bureau of Efficiency to investigate the duplication of work and to report such duplication of service to the President; and gives the President authority to abolish duplications where they may be found to exist.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the following amendments of the Senate:

On Nos. 20 and 21: Relating to an assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, at $5,000 per annum from March 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918.

On No. 22: Relating to the appropriations for the Federal Farm Loan Board.

On No. 71: Relating to increased compensation during the fiscal year 1918 to employees provided for in the bill.

JOSEPH W. BYRNS. T. U. SISSON, JAMES W. GOOD, Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to an hour.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman to yield some time on amendment No. 62.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I would like to have 15 minutes. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Can not the gentleman get along on five minutes? We have some other matters to discuss on this report, and the sundry civil bill is pending in the House. Mr. STEENERSON. I might cut it down to 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, amendment numbered 62 comes back here with an amendment which simply provides That any district established hereunder shall not extend beyond the county except in cities lying within two or more coun-It may extend in such cases to two or more counties.

This is a provision for branch post offices. It is the provision that has been before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads several times in various forms and before the House of Representatives in various forms, and it has been voted down. It was placed in the Postal Savings Bank bill last year in conference—or, rather, it was put in by the Senate and was taken out in conference. It reappeared and was inserted again in the Post Office appropriation bill. It came here as an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill on day before yesterday, and upon a vote it was stricken out.

Notwithstanding the fact that the House had stricken it out. the conferees on this bill included the same provision in this agreement. It reads:

In order to promote economy in the distribution of supplies and in auditing and accounting, the Postmaster General may hereafter designate districts and central offices in such districts through which supplies shall be distributed and accounts rendered, and may establish such branch offices within such districts—

And this is the meat in the coconut-such branch offices within such districts as he may deem necessary; but in no case shall the postmaster at the central office be given authority to abolish offices, to change officers or employees in offices included in such districts: Provided, That any district established hereunder shall not extend beyond a county, except in cities lying within two or more countles.

That last is the proviso I have just read-that it shall not embrace more than one county, except when a town is situated in two or more counties

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Under the amendment that the gentleman refers to, in the counties, may the Postmaster General abolish post offices and establish branch offices?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly; and this does not change the proposition in the slightest degree. They have never advocated, before the committee or anywhere else, that they would establish larger postal districts, in the first instance, than a county. They said they would probably have one head office in each county. This, however, authorizes them to establish a head office for two or more counties where a city is located in two or more counties.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that that would not apply possibly to any place except New York and Boston.

Mr. STEENERSON. But it authorizes the establishment of branch offices in such districts as they may prescribe. This limitation does not amount to anything here. It is the same provision that we voted down yesterday.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman construe this amendment to mean that it would apply to rural districts and counties as well as cities?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Byrns] is not correct when he says it applies only to cities like New York and Boston? Mr. STEENERSON. He is not. I disagree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This amendment on its face shows that it applies only to the cases mentioned by the gentleman from Minnesota, to cities lying within two or more counties.

Mr. CANNON. That is the exception.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is not what it means at all.

Mr. CANNON. It applies to all other counties.
Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. It applies to all other counties.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. These shall be limited to the county.

Mr. HAMLIN. And they may have one office in the county and all the other offices are branches.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. One accounting office in a county. Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a repetition of the process of trying to deceive this House by "jokers" which nobody understands. This provision is intended to reach the third and fourth class post offices. Nobody claims there is economy in it or anything else, except to make third and fourth class post offices account to the larger offices. intended and will accomplish the abolition of all third-class offices now in the United States, because they will be attached to the larger first and second class offices for these purposes. They will be branch offices, and a clerk under the civil service will be put in charge of those offices.

That is what it means. The Post Office Department will not deny it. I have discussed it with the Post Office Department officials for several years. It is in line with their particular hobby. It is in line with their proposition to make all post offices a part of the classified civil service.

This will accomplish that same purpose to the extent that it will only retain an office in the postal district created by the order of the Postmaster General. They may create 3,000 postal districts, which will be one district for each county, or they may create 1,500, which will put two counties in each district. We have about enough first and second class offices to supply the requirement as distributing points in 1,500 districts. There are more than 6,000 third-class offices, which, of course, would be made branch offices; and a branch office is well recognized under the postal laws. It is an office that is put in charge of a civil-service clerk. It seems to me that after the House voted this down two or three days ago it would be ridiculous to vote it up now. The only thing you can do is to vote down the conference report and refuse to agree to this part of it. There is a disagreement on this bill, anyway. That is, this report is not final. It does not embrace all the items in dispute on this bill between the two Houses, and therefore it will not delay the matter if you disagree to this amendment No. 62 as amended by the conferees. It will expedite it just as much to disagree to it, because there must be another conference upon the remaining disagreements, anyway.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have very little time.

Mr. BLACK. I know the gentleman is well posted on this

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. And on every other.

Mr. BLACK. Is not this the same amendment we voted on in the House here a few days ago?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; exactly; and on motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] we struck out the words "branch offices," which left it so that they could establish postal districts for the distribution of supplies to fourthclass offices; and that is the only item on which they claim they can economize. Now, to show you how ridiculous some of the claims of the department are, the Auditor for the Post Office Department, before the Appropriations Committee of this House, stated that he would save $30,000 by this item; that the estimates were $30,000 less if they got this provision. The hearings two years ago upon this subject before the Post Office Committee showed that in every instance where they had established a branch office the expenditures had increased from $500 to $1,000. And to cap the climax of inconsistency the Post-master General handed me a letter a short time ago in which it was stated that this provision would save $250,000. But all of the savings that they have contended for consist in bookkeeping, keeping the accounts of some 50,000 fourth-class offices. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon], which we sustained day before yesterday, I think unanimously, leaves that provision so that you can get all the economy there is in it. There is nothing left except the permission that they can make branch offices wherever they please. It covers first, second, and third class offices. That the House does not want. We have already rejected it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota

has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, this amendment probably ought to have been upon the Post Office appropriation bill instead of upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, just, perhaps, as the prohibition amendment ought to have been on some other bill than the Post Office bill; but the Senate has seen fit to make its amendments as it has, and of course we must consider them as made.

There is a good deal of misunderstanding about this proposition. Gentlemen are of the opinion that the purpose of it is to abolish second and third class offices and put them under the control of some dominant first-class office in the county or district, and therefore affect the civil service to that extent. That is not true in reference to this matter. It is a business proposition for the saving of money in the administration of the postal affairs.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MOON.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does this apply to fourth-class post offices?
Mr. MOON. It applies to fourth-class post offices. Now, I want to try to explain this matter. The amendment as now reported by the conferees and insisted upon by them reads this

In order to promote economy in the distribution of supplies, and in auditing and accounting, the Postmaster General may hereafter designate districts and central offices in such districts through which supplies shall be distributed and accounts rendered, and may establish such branch offices within such districts as he may deem necessary; but in no case shall the postmaster at the central office be given authority to abolish offices, to change officers or employees in offices included in such districts: Provided, That any district established hereunder shall not extend beyond a county except in cities lying within two or more counties.

Now, there are post offices in cities in the United States that extend beyond the boundaries of a single county, and this proviso is intended to apply to those cases.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. MOON. I wanted to discuss this for a moment without being interrupted; but if the gentleman insists, I suppose I shall have to quit.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this amendment you provide that he may establish such branch offices within such district as may be necessary. Under the law the Postmaster General may abolish the offices, may he not?

Mr. MOON. Of course; some of them.

Mr. DOWELL. This does not permit the postmaster to abolish an office, but the Postmaster General may do so. Then there is a provision here for the establishment of branch offices, and under this provision is it not possible that both the fourth and third class offices might be abolished and branch offices established within the county?

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has simply stated the question was about to discuss.

Mr. DOWELL. I am asking for information.

Mr. MOON. I am not going to answer questions categorically unless I want to. I yielded to the gentleman to ask a question, and I will answer it in my own way. Now, before that question was asked I was proceeding to discuss this question. I took up the proviso first to show the necessity where there was an office whose jurisdiction spreads over two counties that the act be made to apply to both, because you do not want a divided jurisdiction as to a particular office. But the act applies only to single counties outside of that situation.

Mr. STEENERSON. It applies to every county in the United States.

Mr. MOON. Why, of course; to every single county in the United States, but not to any combination of counties.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman—

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman allow me

Mr. MOON. No; I can not. I do not want to be interrupted any more until I have finished what I have to say. If I can have an opportunity to say what I mean, then I will yield to anybody for a question; but I do not like to be interrupted and thrown off the line of argument I am intending to make by a lot of questions that I am proposing to answer, if I can, before the inquiry is made.

Let us look at this proposition a moment, gentlemen. What is the purpose of it?

In order to promote economy in the distribution of supplies and in auditing and accounting the Postmaster General may hereafter designate districts and central offices in such districts through which supplies shall be distributed and accounts rendered, and may establish such branch offices within such districts as he may deem necessary.

Now, I take it that every gentleman in this House wants to promote economy in the distribution of supplies, and he wants to promote economy in auditing and accounting in these offices. The question is, Can it be done? You have counties, and we take the county as a unit. Here we have 20 post offices, say, in one county. Each one of these 20 post offices renders an account to the Post Office Department at Washington of the condition of the office, and it requires an auditing and accounting here. Now, if they made a statement without extra cost, and there would be none under the law, to a central office in that county, there would be 20 accounts disposed of there by a return to the postmaster at the central office; and in Washington, instead of auditing 20 accounts from that one county, you would have to audit but 1, and we would transact the business of the office in a more orderly way and with a better system of bookkeeping. In view of that item the Senate has reduced the expenses affecting that item alone $30,000, which will be saved if this provision is adopted. It will be a convenience to the department and a wiser and better system of bookkeeping. I may say also that it will facilitate the distribution of the supplies and save a large amount of money in that way. The whole provision will save $250,000, as I am advised.

The Postmaster General is to establish branch offices in the district as he may deem necessary. Now, why is it that a branch office should not be established, if one is necessary, to promote economy and the distribution of supplies and the accounting in that business. It seems to me it is hardly necessary to argue a question of that sort. Why prohibit him from establishing a branch office when it will promote economy and save money in a single county and in all counties. You say that he may abolish some post offices and that he may change employees. Let us see what the act says:

But in no case shall the postmaster at the central office be given authority to abolish offices, to change officers or employees in offices included in such district.

Now what does that mean?

Mr. STEENERSON. But the Postmaster General has that authority

Mr. MOON. I do not yield now. I am going to present my views upon the question, and then I will yield if I have time.

Now, the postmaster at the central office can not do it-he is prohibited from doing it-and that is the main and disturbing proposition. The Postmaster General has got that authority to-day, this does not prohibit him, but it prohibits the postmaster at the central office from doing it. The Postmaster General has the power to-day under the law to change these offices, so far as fourth-class postmasters are concerned, and 90 per cent of the offices in these counties are fourth-class post offices. But gentlemen fear that there is going to be a change of second and third class offices. There is no indication of it, and the best judgment of the Post Office Department is against it, and all considerations of orderly business transactions and common sense would not justify any suspicion of that sort. The President himself under the power now existing might remove any second or third class postmaster, but he could not—except temporarily—name another without the advice and consent of the Senate, so this provision would not and could not put first, second, and third class postmasters under Fourth-class postmasters are now under it. civil service. it not proper to limit the power and discretion of the Postmaster General, in order to prevent the consolidation of offices, if it appears that the general purpose will result in the general good, just for mere fear that somebody in a second or third class post office may be disturbed. I am not in favor of disturbing these people in these offices. I believe there is nothing here that will justify that fear.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee

has expired

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I want to put in the Record a few reasons from the Post Office Department affecting this question, and why the Senate amendment should be agreed to, as I have not time to discuss them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to, furnished by the Post Office Department, is as follows:

ment, is as follows:

It is very desirable that amendment 62 of the legislative, judicial, and executive bill, authorizing the establishment of branch offices, be adopted as agreed to by the conferees and the words "for such purposes," which were included in the Senate amendment, be eliminated. If they are retained it would practically nullify the usefulness of the proposed amendment, because—

(a) It would limit the establishment of such branch offices solely to the purposes of accounting and distribution of supplies, for which purpose they are unnecessary, as these functions would be performed by the accounting offices.

(b) It would prevent the extension of City Delivery Service to such branches, and there are many towns to which such service could be extended at a reasonable cost, thus increasing the efficiency of the Postal Service and its advantages to the public.

(c) Under the present law for the establishment of branch offices it is impossible to provide adequate service in boom towns, such as those where munition and other large manufacturing establishments are located, because it is necessary to establish fourth-class offices at such places, and they must continue as such for a year, making it impossible to provide adequate postal facilities. This could be obvlated if the department had authority to establish branches at such places and make them a part of the nearest large office.

(d) It would prevent the establishment of stations at points where the troops are mobilized, as such mobilization camps are frequently located far distant from a large office and the only service that can be rendered such camps is from a near-by fourth-class office, which makes it impossible to render efficient service.

(e) It would limit the economical administration of the service by continuing the establishment of independent offices which are unnecessary.

(f) It would also provide for a different class of offices and branches sary.

(f) It would also provide for a different class of offices and branches than those now in existence, which would be very confusing in the administration of the service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the amendment under consideration is an important and far-reaching one, and whatever your opinion may be with regard to it, the matter at least should have your very careful consideration. It proposes a plan and a program that would largely revolutionize the postal situation in the country. Gentlemen who are favoring the amendment lay great stress on its first provision, under which the Postmaster General may create districts within which supplies may be delivered and within which joint reports may be made. None of us have any objection to that. I think that is a very excellent proposition. It will probably result in economy. It might be well to have the country postmaster in a county seat handle the supplies for the entire county and become the accounting officer of the department for the entire county and all the offices in the I hope that will prove to be a wise provision.

But the conferees have written into their agreement a provision that was neither in the Senate bill nor has at any time been agreed to by the House. On the other hand, the House has strenuously opposed it whenever the opportunity to do so has been given. Furthermore, the conferees went beyond their power and authority and jurisdiction as conferees, in my opinion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that be true-

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, it is too late to make a point of order As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Wyoming happened to be called out at the time this was taken up and lost the opportunity. I am not sure that the point of order would be sustained, but I have an idea that it might have been. The provision, as agreed to by the conferees, provides that the Postmaster General may establish such branch offices in the districts he creates as he may deem necessary. Here is a provision under which districts are to be established for report, for the handling of supplies, and, in addition to that, the Postmaster General is to be given authority to establish branch offices in such districts. No such authority is now vested in the Postmaster General. If it were, this would not be necessary. The result of this provision would be that it would be entirely possible within a few years, by the abolishment of fourth-class offices, by failure to appoint fourth-class postmasters, to finally create a condition in which there would be only one postmaster in a district.

Under the plan that gentlemen have in mind the county seat in a majority of cases would be the central office in a given district. While gentlemen are careful to say that the postmaster of the central office may not abolish offices, they are equally careful not to provide that the Postmaster General may not do so. Clearly, the House would not have supported a proposition under which a given postmaster at the county seat might abolish offices. But in my opinion the House should not approve a provision under which the Postmaster General may do that thing. There may be some argument in favor of a centralized postal system, such as is proposed. If post offices and the Postal Service were entirely free from all political influences and could be kept free from political influences, it is possible, I grant you, that a system of this sort under civil service might have some advantages-might have. I doubt if it would have, but it might have. But the post offices are not free from political influences. The post offices will not in our time be entirely free from political influences, and this amendment as agreed to by the conferees provides for the establishment of the finest political system that has ever been suggested by anyone; under it the postmaster in a county seat would be practically the dispenser of all of the patronage for his county or district.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why is this provision in this bill? Does not the mere fact that it is inserted in this bill, where it does not belong, suggest that there is some scheme behind it?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, there is a scheme behind it. is a scheme that certain gentlemen have been trying to write into law for a long time on one bill or another, and they have tried it first on one bill and then on another. Finally, they have gotten the conferees upon this bill to accept an adroitly worded provision under which they have accomplished their purpose, without that accomplishment being plain enough on its face that "he who runs may read," unless he read carefully.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. COX. If there is any scheme in this proposal, it must be laid at the door of the junior Senator from the State of Washington over at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know about that; but I know, and the gentleman knows, that this proposition of having postal districts within which to establish a local postal czar has been agitated for some time, and the House, so far as I have understood it, has been almost solidly against it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.
Mr. LANGLEY. Will not the effect of this be, if adopted, to aid by indirection the scheme to classify postmasters which the House so overwhelmingly repudiated the other day?

Mr. MONDELL. It does in a way classify postmasters, because the clerk or the official in charge of the branch office would probably be under the classified service; and he would be the lieutenant of the postmaster in the central office in a business way and in a political way.

Mr. LANGLEY. The effect would be to aid in the extension of that general scheme.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not so much worried about whatever aid this might render toward the extension of civil service. I believe in civil service of the right kind, and where it can be properly operated. For nearly 20 years I had the nominating of all of the postmasters in my State, and I never care to have that responsibility again. It never did assist me politically, in my opinion. It was a trying and vexatious duty. I tried to perform my duty in making those nominations, but if we are to depart from the system now established and maintained, let us depart from it intelligently, and not, under a pretense of reform, actually establish a spoils system more objectionable than any we have ever had in connection with the Postal Service. [Applause.] That is exactly what we would do if we adopted this conference report and this amendment. We would enable the Post Office Department to establish a system under which, scattered all over the country, would be these zones, these districts of local political authority. Just now they would be in Democratic hands. When the administration changes, they will be in Republican hands; but they will be almost as objectionable in one case as in the other.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MONDELL, Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I understand that one of the objects of this amendment is economy. As a matter of fact, would it not

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming

has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman grant me two minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am very sorry, but I have more requests for time now than I can fulfill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. The argument in opposition to this proposition is based on fear. This proposal has not its genesis with the present Postmaster General. It first originated more than eight years ago with a committee of expert accountants em-ployed to investigate the conditions in the Post Office Department and to make a report as to economies in the administra-tion of the department and the Postal Service. I happened to be chairman of the subcommittee that went over that voluminous report. The special accountants recommended that instead of imposing this burden of accounting on little post offices to report to the Post Office Department here in Washington with the same minutia of detail as if it were a first, second, or third class office, that it would be a better economical business management to enable them to purchase their supplies from a central office established in a nearby neighborhood. no attempt at that time to discontinue the fourth-class post offices. There is no attempt by this provision to discontinue the fourth-class post offices. The Postmaster General has the same authority to do that without this amendment as he has with it. But I direct the attention of the committee to what really is proposed by this proposal. You will notice that it is for the purpose of promoting economy in the distribution of supplies and in auditing and accounting and of authorizing the Postmaster General to designate districts and central offices. What is purposed under this authority? The department instead of sending out supplies to every little fourth-class post office, where the salary is two, three, or four hundred dollars, will send supplies to some central office in the county. That central office will furnish the printed matter, will furnish the stamps, will furnish the money-order blanks, and all matters of that kind to these little fourth-class post offices, and the fourth-class post offices, instead of being compelled to account directly for money-order blanks or order for stamps, or order for stamped en-velopes, or other things that the post offices are required to do, will be saved of that burden. Any person who is acquainted with the conditions will realize that it is in the interest of economy. Now, assuming the system has been established, the fourth-class post offices will get supplies perhaps from the office at the county seat. That will give the gentleman who happens to be postmaster at the county seat no greater authority than he has to-day in the management of the post office.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the Blackmon amendment, which was adopted as part of this same provision in the Post Office bill, leaves this provision intact, and only struck out the branch post offices

Mr. STAFFORD. I overlooked nothing. I am discussing this proposition, and I overlooked nothing in the amendment. The gentleman is conjuring up fears, as other gentleman have, of a political bugaboo. The gentleman from Wyoming frankly admits fourth-class postmasters' appointments are a political handicap.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield further. No matter how you study this proposition you will see the one and only purpose of it is to relieve the fourth-class postmasters of the detail of accounting in the purchase of their supplies. Nothing further, and the committee has gone further and restricted it so that the supplying office can not cover more than one county; that the district must be coterminous with the county, unless the post office happens to be located in two counties.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Do I understand it includes all the fourth-class post offices? How about the second and third?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman thinks the Postmaster General will eliminate second and third class offices, a secondclass office where the post-office receipts must be above $40,000. It is beyond comprehension to me, even including the third-class offices, I will say to the gentleman frankly

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon]. [Ap-

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the legislative bill presents a rather novel proposition. The Post Office Committee of the House has repeatedly turned down the proposition here asserted, and only two days ago the House of Representatives, by an overwhelming majority, went on record as opposing the proposition here asserted, and yet it is claimed that the persistent efforts to force this provision mean nothing. If they do not, I want to ask the House why, then, is it placed on the legislative bill, a place where, it must be conceded, such a provision is not entitled to be? If it does not mean exactly what it says, that is, that it authorizes the Postmaster General to make substations out of presidential offices, then it means nothing on earth. [Applause.]

Again there is another reason aside from this why we should turn down this provision. Coming as it does on the legislative bill shows that the Postmaster General or some one else is evidently undertaking to do that which, as I have said, is in direct conflict with the will of this body heretofore expressed when this identical proposition was placed squarely before us.

I submit that the Appropriations Committee has no jurisdiction whatever of the subject matter of the proposed amendment. It seems to me, therefore, that the House of Representa-tives ought not to stand for it. In view of this performance, I am not surprised at the strong opposition that developed among Members when it was suggested that we have a budget committee, and that the budget committee should be the Appropriations Committee of the House. I for one, and in my judgment, the House, will never allow the Appropriations Committee, or any other committee, to assume jurisdiction over a subject which clearly belongs to another and legally constituted committee of the House. If the Appropriations Committee can take a provision that has been rejected by a regularly and legally constituted committee of the House, and, indeed, by the House itself, and place it on a conference report on another bill in disregard of the wishes of the House, what excuse or purpose can we give for the existence of any other committee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACKMON. I do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that the amendment was put on in the Senate, if I remember correctly, by the Senator from Washington, and the Senate conferees insisted strongly that the amendment should go on in order to reach a conclusion and make a report to the House, and the House conferees yielded because they thought the amendment was proper. I think that the reflection that the gentleman is seeking to make against the Appropriations Committee of the House is wholly unfounded and unjust.

Mr. BLACKMON. I am not making any reflection against anyone in the House, but the conferees from the House of Representatives ought to have known that two days ago this House overwhelmingly said, "We will not stand for this provision"; and if there is any criticism it is of the conferees for consenting to do that which they know, or ought to have known, that the body they represent had turned down.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that the House conferees have been in conference several days upon this proposition, and, so far as I am personally concerned, I knew nothing about any action taken by the House two days ago or at any other time on a proposition similar to this.

Mr. BURNETT. Does not the gentleman know it is a matter over which this committee had no jurisdiction?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Black].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I am more or less familiar with the proposition now under discussion, and I thoroughly concur with my colleagues on that committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Steenerson], in the statements which they have just made that this amendment as sought to be modified by the conferees ought not to be agreed to. [Applause.]

There is one feature that would follow the adoption of this suggested amendment that has been overlooked in the speeches just made by the gentlemen who have addressed the House, and that is that if the Postmaster General, acting under the authority which would be granted him by this proposal, should abolish certain post offices in a county and make them branch offices of a central office he would not have the power to reestablish such offices, if the need for it should arise, except by express statutory enactment. In other words, if I interpret the situation correctly, if we should adopt such a law as is proposed in this amendment, then we ought to follow it up with a general provision giving the Postmaster General authority to restore what he had discontinued whenever in his judgment the needs of the public service should require it. We had a concrete example of what I am talking about when the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL], a member of our committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, came before the House the other day with a bill seeking to give the Postmaster General authority to restore post offices that had been abolished and made branch offices under the authority that the Postmaster General now has to establish branch offices in villages, towns, or cities of 1,500 or more inhabitants not distant more than 5 miles, as near as may be, from the center boundary or limits of such city or town in which the principal office is located. According to the ruling of the Postmaster General, as I understand he has expressed it to Mr. Ran-DALL, after a post office has once been abolished and made a branch office to a central office, then it matters not how irksome the change may become to the patrons or how inconvenient the change may be, you can not restore the offices except by an act of Congress giving the Postmaster General the authority to discontinue such branch offices and reestablish them as separate and independent post offices.

If I have not stated correctly the interpretation which Postmaster General Burleson places on existing law, then I would like to be corrected. But I am sure I have made no mistake in what I have stated to the House in respect to this matter. The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] stated to the House the other day, when he was endeavoring to get his bill up for consideration, that the patrons of the post offices which had been discontinued and made branch offices of the Los Angeles post office were dissatisfied with the change, and want again to have their offices made separate post offices, but that the Postmaster General had told him that, notwithstanding he was inclined to do so, and would like to do so, that he did not have the authority to reestablish them except by authority of an act of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, let there be no misapprehension concerning the extent of the authority granted to the Postmaster General by the provision which we now have under discussion. read it very carefully, and it is my opinion that under it he will have the unquestioned authority to establish a central office in every county of the United States, and make every other office in the county a branch office to that central office; and, according to my interpretation of it, it can not mean anything else. Now, what does a branch office mean? that the office in question loses its identity as a separate office and becomes attached as a branch to such designated central office. I do not believe that this House wants to place that authority in the hands of the Postmaster General, and has expressed itself directly to the contrary within the last few days.

Now, if the phrase "and may establish such branch offices within such districts as he may deem necessary" is omitted, I apprehend that this House will be willing to accept the rest of the provision without objection.

Now, upon the general proposition that the establishment of branch offices would promote economy and efficiency of the service I will say to you that if I believed that result would follow, then I would advocate the amendment. I would not consciously oppose any amendment to the postal laws and regulations which I believed would promote economy and efficiency in the Postal Service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLACK. I regret to say that I can not; I have not the I have only two minutes. But I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Byrns] that the investigation that our committee has made of this subject, and which we have approached with no other idea or purpose than to conserve the interests of the people, brings us to the unquestioned opinion that it will not work for economy and the betterment of the service; and therefore I hope that the House will stand by the Senate amendment as it now appears in the Senate bill on page 120, and will not consent to the modification of that amendment by agreeing that the phrase "and may establish such branch offices within such districts as he may deem necessary. [Applause,]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Black], who last addressed the House. I am satisfied that this legislation should not be enacted for any reason that has been assigned. As to the method by which legislation is to be forced through the House or the Senate from time to time, so far as that is concerned, it arises largely out of the rules of the House and the Senate, which put nine-tenths of all the important legislation upon appropriation bills that must pass. But I will not discuss that. It is funny, if it were not serious, but the Senate, or somebody, when they set their head for legislation, take all the chances. The Post Office Committee has this identical matter in conference now on substantially similar amendment, but they can not wait. They put it on the legislative bill. They want to attach it here, there, and yonder. Whether it will get on the deficiency bill or the Military Academy bill, God knows! You have got to watch it [laughter] when you deal—and I speak respectfully of the other branch of Congress—with the Senate, and under the practice that has grown up somewhat in the House, but very greatly in the Senate.

Now, I do not believe the supply proposition is an economical one, and I will tell you why. In the event this amendment passes you will send to 3,600 counties the supplies, and then they will go to the branch post offices. There will be double accounting. And then the branch post offices will report to the central post office. They have got to report, and the auditing that is now done in Washington would be done in between three and four thousand central offices, I assume, in the counties of the United States, and then it would go to the grand accounting here.

Mr. ASHBROOK. And it will require additional clerical force in each central office?

Mr. CANNON. The centralization comes running all along the line, and it ought to stop. We ought to popularize this service. We ought not to put it under 3,600 bosses. You may ask if the Democrats are not in possession of the post offices in my county, with nearly 100,000 people. Yes; and they all ought to be in existence, and they are all filled by Democrats, who are performing their duty, so far as I know, and will render their accounting as the law now provides. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, as one of the conferees I want to state that this bill has been in conference for quite a number Your conferees have labored earnestly with the conferees of the Senate to endeavor to reach an agreement. managers on the part of the House have absolutely no pride in defending this particular amendment. The Senate insists upon it, and the House does not want it, and we bring it back to you. But the criticism made that the committee goes out of its way under the rules of the House is an unjust one, because in two instances this is under the jurisdiction of this committee. First, it deals with the purely administrative office here in the city of Washington, to wit, the Post Office Department, and the business is audited here. Second, under the Holman rule, on its face it reduces expenses, and is therefore in order on this or any other appropriation bill.

But what does the amendment do? It simply reduces the auditing in the city of Washington to about 4,000 accounts, in round numbers, instead of a million accounts. The audit is made from the postmasters of the county to the one postmaster. The supplies, the postage stamps, and the business that is transacted in the county are transmitted and transacted through that postmaster, and the postmaster is held accountable for that business within the county by the department here, is the way it affects all the post offices within the county. is the assurance of the department. It simply means that you save the auditing of something over a million accounts. Under the system that is proposed in the Senate—and your conferees, after quite a contest, have agreed to it—it simply means you will have 4,000 audits here, and so far as saving money is concerned there is no sort of question on earth about it, because the postmaster in the county would get absolutely nothing more than he now gets for auditing the accounts. master in the county will be the county auditor, and he would make his audit to the Postmaster General's office here in the city of Washington.

That, as we understand, is the sole and only purpose of this item here. It does not affect the present postmasters or their standing or their status. If the President should decide to do so, he to-morrow could virtually put every postmaster under the civil service and could hold examinations. There is no reason on earth why he should not do it under the general law. Therefore you are gaining nothing by voting this item down, except that thereby you would say you will keep up the old-fashioned system of auditing. That is all there is to it. I do not believe in raising a mountain out of a molehill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Inasmuch as the gentleman knows that this conference report is as dead as a doornail, would he not save time by asking for a record vote on it? [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that this conference report is as dead as a doornail. [Laughter.] I do not know, either, since when the gentleman has gotten to be such a great conservator of time and the mentor of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Does not the gentleman believe that the system proposed here simply adds another middleman to the service?

Mr. SISSON. I do not.

Mr. BARNHART. 1 can not see it in any other way.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BURNETT. M Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the gentleman believe that the construction which he gives is the construction that the Postmaster General will put on this clause?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know what construction the Postmaster General will put on it, or what any other man will put on the law. I only want to know what the language of the amendment is.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Dowell].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for two minutes

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, just why this very important amendment relating to the Postal Service comes from this committee I do not know. I want to call your attention to one fact, gentlemen, before you vote on this proposition, and it occurs to me that when we know the purpose of it, it can not have the sanction of this House.

The Postmaster General in his last annual report, referring to the branch post offices, states as follows:

Attention is again invited to the advisability of removing the legal restrictions as to the establishment of branch post offices and postal stations and providing for the establishment of nonaccounting offices, which would make possible a more efficient and economical administration of the Post Office Service.

This provision removes the restriction which he asks to be removed in order that he may have a central post office in every county in the United States. If you adopt this provision, it is clear that the plan of the department is to be carried out, and every second and third class office in the country will be abolished, and we will have one central office in every county in a State for distribution, and all the others will be branch offices.

It seems to me that the purpose of this provision is clear, and everyone who votes for it votes to empower the Postmaster General to carry out this plan and establish a central office for every county. This is the proposition advocated by the Postmaster General when he asks that the restrictions of the law be removed in order that he may do identically what is authorized in this amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing this morning a very important matter touching the Postal Service. I desire to call the attention of the conferees on the part of the House and the membership of the House itself to another provision in this conference report which very vitally affects the efficiency of the work of the Department of Agriculture.

I refer to amendment numbered 58, which would absolutely paralyze, if it is permitted to become the law, the activities of the Department of Agriculture along many of its lines of work. The provision is this:

That hereafter no Government official or employee shall receive any salary in connection with his services as such an official or employee from any source other than the Government of the United States, except as may be contributed out of the treasury of any State, county, or municipality.

If that language is allowed to become the law, it practically repeals the provisions of the agricultural extension act. It practically paralyzes the county-agent work of the Northwest and the North and the Northeast. It paralyzes the county-agent work of the South. It destroys the cooperative work that is now being carried on by the Bureau of Markets. It would destroy the work that is now being carried on for the eradication of citrus canker. It would destroy the work that is proposed to be carried on under a provision inserted in the Senate for the eradication and arrest of the white-pine blister rust.

The prohibition contained in the Senate amendment undoubtedly was aimed at certain cooperative arrangements of other educational agencies with the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Institute. I desire to say that the Department of Agriculture does not now and has not within the past two years had any relationship in the least with those two institu-We provided against it in the Agricultural appropriation bill of 1914, I think. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, written very recently, saying that he could absolutely state in all positiveness that there was no such relationship existing between the Department of Agriculture and these foundations. I desire that this conference report shall be voted down, not only for the reasons that have been suggested by other gentlemen but for the to me more important reason that if you agree to this Senate amendment you have practically locked the wheels of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman just for a ques-

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman explain to the House from what sources these agents derive compensation other than from State, county, and municipal?

LEVER. The agricultural extension act provides, in addition to that, that the Department of Agriculture may receive contributions from colleges, local authorities, or individual contributions within the State for the maintenance of these cooperative arrangements. The current law for the Agricultural Department provides that in the demonstration work they may receive contributions in addition to those had from State, county, and municipal agencies, also from associations of farmers, individual farmers, universities, colleges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, other local associations of business men, business organizations, and individuals within the State. That is for your demonstration work. Now, under the Bureau of Markets provision is made

For acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products and the purchasing of farm supplies, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the department, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the transportation, marketing, and distributing of farm and food products.

There may be cooperation through the same agencies, and by the adoption of this amendment you have paralyzed the service. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of Tennessee. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Candler].

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire to emphasize what has already been so well said by the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever] in reference to this provision, amendment No. 58, to which he called attention. He did not read quite all of it. It goes further and provides that no person, association, or corporation shall make any contribution to or in any way supplement the salary of any Government official.

Now, just take a practical illustration in my own county. For instance, the young lady who has charge of the canning-club girls in that county, and work along that line, receives from the Government of the United States part of her salary. The county pays part of it and the banks and private individuals pay the balance, so that her salary is paid by the Government, the county, the banks, and individuals. Her name is Miss Elizabeth Brown, and she is doing splendid work. The same provision would apply to the county demonstration agents in Mississippi as well as in other parts of the country. The county agent in my county is Mr. W. T. Pollard, a most excellent agent, who is also doing fine work. Here it is proposed to enact into law that no patriotic citizen in the United States desiring to contribute to this kind of salaries and to help thereby to develop the resources of his county, State, or Nation will be allowed to do so. By this provision he would not be permitted to contribute one single, solitary cent to the pay of those who are laboring for the advancement of this great cause. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever] called attention to certain lines of cooperative work. Here is one:

For acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products and the purchasing of farm supplies, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the department, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the transportation, marketing, and distributing of farm and food products.

Not a single solitary dollar could be contributed by any citizen, any banker, any corporation, or by any person in the United States for the purpose of carrying out that work in cooperation with the Government of the United States, but this amendment

No. 58 would absolutely prevent that being done. [Applause.]
Mr. BURNETT. Does not the gentleman think that is leveled against the action of the Bureau of Education more than anything else?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Probably that is true.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It may have been the in-tention to limit it to contributions of that kind, but this provision goes much further and forbids any and all contributions from any and all sources to aid any and all work. It would destroy all cooperative work, and especially the cooperative agricultural work North, South, East, and West, which is proving so beneficial to the farmers and agricultural interests of the country. I know the Members of this House do not want to do that, and therefore to prevent it you must vote down this report. Vote "no" good and strong when the vote is taken,

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi

has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question or two about a matter which has not been referred to. There seems to be a discrepancy in one matter between the statement made by the conferees and the conference report. I notice the report says that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17 and agrees to the same with an amendment, whereas the statement says that the House agrees to the Senate amendment and appropriates $4,140 for the clerks as proposed by the Senate. I should like to ask the gentleman which is correct?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The statement is correct. entleman will recall that the House made an appropriation of $4,000 to pay for an automobile for the Secretary of State

Mr. GILLETT. Not to pay for an automobile—that is 16; I refer to amendment 17. That statement says that it-

Appropriates $4,140, as proposed by the Senate, for employees now paid from the appropriation for emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the Senate inserted an amendment providing for four emergency employees in the State Department, amounting to $4,140. The conferees agreed to an amendment which was suggested in conference to make a lump-sum appropriation of $4,140 for that purpose, but without designating the number of persons to be

Mr. GILLETT. What was the purpose of that amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that it is an emergency fund, appropriated in order to give the Secretary of State the privilege of employing extra employees if he desires to do so.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course-

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has always been the custom to make these appropriations in lump sums, and to give some leeway as to the number he may employ. He may desire to employ one for a year or for only two or three months.

Mr. GILLETT. The Senate amendment put on an appropria-tion for four clerks, naming what classes. Those would be under the civil service, and I wondered, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether the purpose of the House amendment was that they should not be under the civil service but should be appointed as the Secretary of State pleased.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only say that so far as the House conferees are concerned, and certainly from my viewpoint, the object was to make this appropriation and give the Secretary of State the privilege of employing extra clerks in the State Department to this extent, for such time during the year as he may think necessary, whether it be for 12 months, 6 months, or 3 months.

Mr. GILLETT. That could be done under the Senate provision. Did the House conferees invent this amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That amendment came from the Senate; but, as I say, the Senate made provision for the employment of four employees throughout the year.

Mr. GILLETT. It did not say throughout the year. I do not know whether the gentleman misunderstands me or whether he does not wish to state the facts. What I want to know is whether the purpose was to take them out of the civil service or not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that the amendment will have the effect of taking them out of the civil service.

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I suspected. Allow me to further suggest that it naturally excites a suspicion, I will not say of myself, but it would excite the suspicion that here was an appropriation of just about enough to give the appointment of a clerk to each one of the conferees. We all know that when an arrangement like that is made it is made for the purpose of giving patronage to somebody, and I would like to know whether that suspicion is justified.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, how much time have

I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I did not hear the gentleman's answer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not care to spend my remaining five minutes on this question; but I will say that so far as I am concerned and so far as any member of the Appropriations Committee of the House is concerned, none of us have one dollar of this patronage, nor will any of us receive any in the future under this appropriation.

Mr. GILLETT. I expected that answer, and I am glad the gentleman has given it, for I assume it was the Senate for whom this patronage is provided; but I regret to see the conferees of the House responsible for an amendment like this, whose real purpose is obviously to take some clerkships out of the civil service and make patronage of them; and I also regret and am mortified that the House conferees should be used as a cat's-paw to pull this patronage out for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that one can not get all he wants in a conference. One set of conferees can not have their way independently of the views of the

I think the Secretary of State needs the additional service. Now, Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said here concerning the post-office provision, and I think gentlemen are laboring under a serious misapprehension. Under the present law every fourth-class postmaster has an account in the Post Office Department here. There are more than 56,000 first, second, third, and fourth class offices in the country. That necessitates having more than a million accounts with which the Auditor for the Post Office Department has to deal every year. If this amendment is adopted, it will permit the Postmaster General to establish a central accounting office in each county, so that the Post Office Department will have then not exceeding 150,000 accounts with which to deal here in Washington.

In addition to that, it is proposed by the Postmaster General, if this amendment is adopted, to establish a monthly system of accounting with these central offices in various counties.

Now, gentlemen, it simply means that if the provision goes in it will save to the Government more than $250,000 every year in the Post Office Department here alone. This provision, if it goes in, will reduce the expenses of the Auditor's Office of the Post Office Department $30,000 in this bill for this year; but if you vote the report down, if you do not put this amendment in, we will have to go back to the Senate and restore the $30,000 to the bill for the Office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General says that in his judgment, if you will permit him to put this provision into effect, he will save to this Government more than half a million dollars every year. I submit that this House ought not to sit here and, simply because somebody has a suspicion that some postmaster in some county may lose his job, subject the taxpayers to more than half a million dollars' expense each year.

It has been stated that the Appropriation Committee in adopting this amendment has undertaken to go beyond its jurisdic-

This amendment was put on the bill in the Senate, and tion. the Senate conferees stood solidly and unanimously in favor of it and insisted that it should go on this bill. Upon that conference committee was a member of the Senate Post Office Committee. The chairman of the Post Office Committee of the House has addressed you this morning and has urged you to adopt this provision in the interest of economy, efficiency, and good service in the Government. That is all there is to that.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I can not; I have yielded all my time, and I want to discuss one other amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee

has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to refer to the remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever] with reference to the amendment reported by the conference committee providing that no employee of the United States Gov-ernment shall receive any additional salary as such employee from any other source except it come from from a State, county, or municipal agency. I submit that that will take care of the demonstration work being done by the Agricultural Department in cooperation with the county, State, and municipality. For my part, I do not believe that a United States officer should receive compensation as such officer from an individual or any association of individuals in the country, using the Government frank, acting in behalf of this Government, and with the stamp of approval of this Government. I have no objection to a great endowment fund, the great funds that are being used in various directions for the benefit of the people, but I believe, gentlemen of the House, that this Government is able to pay its own bills and that it should not go into partnership with private individuals in the performance of governmental activities. I do not believe that we ought under the practice of the payment of a dollar a year permit men to come in and occupy desks in our bureaus and in some cases act as chief of a division, receiving, as they do, a large salary from outside sources.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more; I want to ask him a question.

Mr. BURNETT. Make it two minutes; I want to ask him a

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that where the law now allows cooperative farmers' organizations to contribute something toward the cost of experts in the Agricultural Department in order to have farm demonstration work that that is an injury?
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that this amendment would cut that all out.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not, I will say to the gentleman. There is no reason on earth why individuals in any State or county could not make a contribution for that purpose through the county court.

Mr. MANN. The county court has no jurisdiction, at least not in my State.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know in my own State that individuals in the county have raised funds and through the county court of the county have contributed to the payment of expenses and salaries of farm demonstration agents is to instruct the conferees.

Mr. Speaker, I think the only thing for us to do Mr. MANN.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The conferees certainly do not desire to do otherwise than carry out the wishes of the House. Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BYRNS of Tencessee. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Is anyone except the faker at the head of the Educational Bureau employing these dollar-a-year men? Is it being done anywhere else?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I dissent most earnestly from the designation of the gentleman occupying the position of Commissioner of Education as a faker.

Mr. BURNETT. I think he has proven to be a faker. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman occupying that position is a man of high character and a distinguished educator. He has rendered great and distinguished service to the cause of education, and certainly does not deserve the designation given him by the gentleman.

Mr. BURNETT. Let the gentleman answer my question. Is anyone doing that except him?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have been informed, and I can only state this upon information—the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever] probably knows—that there are more than a hundred in the Agricultural Department who are receiving a dollar a year.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true; but the Secretary of Agriculture had a letter printed in the RECORD some time ago in which he said that none of his cooperative work is in connection with the General Education Board or the Carnegie Institution.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That answers the question of the gentleman from Alabama to the effect that that practice is going on not only in the Bureau of Education but in the Agricultural Department as well, and possibly in some other depart-

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Bynns of Tennessee) there were—ayes 21, noes 199. So the conference report was rejected.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a further conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the motion, so that we may have a separate vote on amendments 4, 22, 58, 62, and 71. One of them is an attempt to repeal a Senate resolution by action of the House, and on that I desire a minute. The others are the Farm Loan Board proposition, and this proposition that was just up in respect to the Department of Agriculture, the Post Office proposition, and the clerks' pay.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think that the gentleman will insist upon a vote on Senate amendment No. 4, will he?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield me a couple of minutes, I shall not, but that is the only way that I can get the time. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I-may want some time on the sparate propositions. The Senate inserted an amendment in separate propositions. this bill repealing certain Senate resolutions, simple Senate reso-The Senate can repeal those simple Senate resolutions lutions. when they desire. The House has taken the liberty, on the part of the conferees, of insisting upon a change in the amendment by which the resolutions were repealed. The Senate has nothing to do with simple House resolutions and can not repeal them. The House has nothing to do with simple Senate resolutions and can not repeal them. It is none of our business, and I object to the House conferees agreeing to the Senate amendment at all, and much less agreeing to it with an amendment, thereby undertaking to tell the Senate what simple resolutions shall be repealed by an act of Congress

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the Senate needs help, does not the gentleman think the House should be glad to give the help that it needs to regulate its affairs?

Mr. MANN. I am afraid the gentleman from New York too often does that to the disadvantage of the House—privately.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not do anything privately. Mr. MANN. I do not believe it is our business. Suppose Senate had put an amendment in the bill repealing a simple House resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a different matter; but as they can not repeal their own simple resolutions by resolution of the Senate and they need the help of the House, I do not think that we ought to be finicky about it.

Mr. MANN. The House conferees struck out the Senate amendment and undertook to tell the Senate what simple Senate resolutions shall be repealed, and it is none of their business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the Senate is willing to have us do it. They need our help.

Mr. MANN. If the Senate wants to repeal a Senate resolution, let the Senate do it. I am opposed to the precedent. I do not believe that the Senate should be consulted about simple House resolutions, and I do not think the House has any wish to interfere with simple Senate resolutions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But they are appealing to us to help them, and what can we do otherwise?

Mr. MANN. I grant that the gentleman from New York makes the best excuse that can be offered for the action, and that is the only excuse that has been offered. But if they want the services of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in the Senate, they might elect him an honorary Member.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It probably would not do the Senate any

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the facts are that these three Senate resolutions enumerated in this amendment of the Senate provided for the employment of three $1,440 clerks who were assigned to three different Senate committees and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. With which we have nothing to do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, certain Senators desired to repeal these resolutions, and the Senate adopted this amendment, which repealed those three resolutions but at the same time placed one of these clerks, a clerk to the Post Office Committee, upon the regular statutory roll. The House conferees were unwilling under the circumstances to agree to that extra clerk because the House Post Office Committee has only about $4,900 in clerical assistants—a clerk, an assistant clerk, and a janitor-and the Senate Post Office Committee already has a clerk and an assistant clerk, two other clerks at $1,400 each, and a messenger. In other words, the House Post Office Committee has an expenditure for clerks each year of about $4,900, whereas the Senate has an expenditure of over $8,900, or about that sum.

The House conferees felt it was unfair for the Senate Post Office Committee to ask for another $1,400 clerk in addition. It was insisted by the Senate conferees, one of whom was a member of the Post Office Committee, that this clerk was necessary, and it was agreed by the Senate conferees that they would yield on the amendment placing the clerk on the statutory roll, but would strike out this provision repealing one of these resolu-tions so as to permit the Post Office Committee of the Senate to retain that clerk and pay him out of its contingent expenses. There were two amendments which repealed two Senate resolutions

Mr. MANN. Three.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Two after that was stricken outtwo Senate resolutions calling for clerks at $1,400, and, as the gentleman from New York has stated, the Senate conferees asked the House conferees to help them save this money to the Public Treasury. This bill, of course, can repeal the Senate resolution, and the House conferees gladly yielded on that, because it meant an actual saving of $2,880 and helped to reduce the great number of clerks the Senate has put upon the rolls of the Senate in the past.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield a little more time? He took up the most of my time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman's time had expired.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has used more than two minutes, but I will gladly yield to him such time as he

Mr. MANN. I have used about two and a half minutes. The Senate amendment undertook to repeal three resolutions and each of those resolutions provided for a particular employee. The Senate action was to repeal three resolutions, cutting out three employees. The House conferees insisted upon leaving one employee by cutting out the repeal of one of these resolutions. In other words, the Senate having acted, I think, illegally, as far as that is concerned, by inserting a provision in this bill for the repeal of three resolutions which carried employees, the House conferees insisted that the Senate should not repeal one resolution and should not dispense with one

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman is wrong.
Mr. MANN. That is the record and the gentleman can not go behind the record. Now, the gentleman says the House conferees did that at the request of the Senate conferees, but I know very often the House or Senate conferees go into conference in favor of an amendment with their fingers crossed, not representing either body, but asking the conferees on the other side to insist upon something they wanted. The Senate cut out one employee that one of the Senate conferees wanted to retain, and at the request of the Senate the conferees on the part of the House insisted that the House should interfere and keep him on there-wholly improper, and the whole thing is improper. It is none of our business. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the House will turn to page 7 of the legislative bill it will find the Senate placed an amendment upon the bill for an additional assistant clerk to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads at $1,400

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with Senate amendment

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That clerk has formerly been carried upon the rolls of the Senate and paid out of the contingent expenses of the Senate under Senate resolution 421, Sixty-third Congress, second session. Now, when the conferees came together the House conferees insisted that the Senate ought not to insist upon adding to its already large number of clerks for the Post Office Committee, and the Senate conferees agreed that they would not ask for this clerk to be carried on the statutory rolls, but they insisted that he was needed by the Post Office Committee, and therefore they insisted they did not care then to repeal Senate resolution 421 which permitted them to carry this clerk of the Post Office Committee on the contingent-fund roll of the Senate

Mr. MANN. Keep him in office.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Retaining him in office, and certainly, as the gentleman from Illinois has just said, this House has nothing to do with the business of the Senate. If the Senate wants to pay that clerk to the committee out of the contingent fund I submit this House can not prevent it except possibly at the expense of good feeling between the two bodies.

Mr. MANN. Is this clerk carried on page 7? Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The House struck out that clerk from the regular statutory roll, where they were proposing to place him, and left it to the Senate as to whether or not they continue to keep him under resolution 421. Now, that explains

Now, with reference to these other two resolutions, it was represented to the House conferees that these two clerks were carried on certain other committees, and it was the desire of Senators to repeal those resolutions so as to avoid that expense and that drain upon the contingent fund expenses.

And being perfectly willing to help the Senate conferees save $2,880 for the people, the House conferees gladly came to their rescue and agreed that those two resolutions might be repealed. As a matter of fact, when this amendment came up in the Senate the repeal of these three resolutions was voted on as one proposition. The Senate conferees requested the House conferees to agree, that these two resolutions might be repealed and those two useless offices abolished. That is all it means.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the first half of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Byrns] that the House further insist on its disagreement to all Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question. I ask for a separate vote on 42, 58, 62, and 71. I have no objection to the others.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman is for a separate vote on amendments 42, 58, 62, and 71. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put the rest of them en grosse. favor of further insisting on a disagreement to the rest of Senate amendments say "aye." [After a pause.] The ayes have it.

Now, as to amendment 42, those in favor of further insisting____ Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield me one or two

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman for

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he desires to insist on amendment 42, which reduces the number of messengers in The Adjutant General's office?

Mr. MANN. I ask to change from 42 to 22. It is on page 42. The SPEAKER. The question is on further insisting on disagreement to Senate amendment 22.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in amendment No. 22.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers a preferential motion

Mr. MANN. In amendment 22 with an amendment.

The SPEAKER, In amendment No. 22 with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Referring to the House print, as far as the page and line are concerned, by striking out on page 43, line 1, the sum of "$182,380" and inserting in lieu thereof "$222,380"; and in line 2 strike out "$260,000" and insert "$300,000."

Mr. LEVER. What is that?

Mr. MANN. The Farm Loan Board.

The SPEAKER, The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43, line 1, strike out "$182,380" and insert "$222,380." And in line 2 strike out "$260,000" and insert "$300,000."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield me five minutes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but before I yield will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? As I understand your amendment, it would make the total appropriation, if it was to go in as it is written in the bill, of $377,000? Mr. MANN. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the House provision, in other words?

Mr. MANN. As to the amount.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I proposed the amendment as read so that they would conform with the amount heretofore agreed to by the House, because I did not feel authorized to propose a diminution in the amount. The only question at issue is this: The House provision appropriated the bulk sum of $300,000, giving the Farm Loan Board discretion absolutely as to how it should be expended and what salary should be paid to its clerks and other employees. And I am told that they have employed some clerks at $4,000, $5,000, and $6,000, money which more profitably ought to be expended in the field service than raising the pay of clerks for this board way above the pay of similar clerks in other boards. The same is true as to the private secretaries of the members of the board. The Senate specifically appropriated for the salaries of the board, the secretary of the board, publicity agent, private secretaries, and various clerks sufficient to man the office in Washington, putting in the salaries and taking that amount out of the lumpsum appropriation, leaving the lump-sum appropriation for service, I take it, in the field.

Now, I do not believe that we ought to start in with a new Federal Farm Loan Board by paying exorbitant salaries to secretaries and clerks and other officials in Washington under the board. Unless we specify the salaries these people are to receive, the Farm Loan Board, new at the business, wholly unfamiliar with administrative work under the Government, will be paying salaries that are out of sight. And then next year we will be asked to specifically appropriate for those salaries. Then every other board will have a request for the same salaries. Let these people have the same salaries that are paid in other similar departments of the Government.

Mr. BURNETT. I see the force of the suggestion, but I ask the gentleman if his amendment will reach that proposition?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Mr. BURNETT. It seems to increase the amount.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The Senate appropriated $77,620 for salaries, specifically setting them forth, and then appropriated $182,380 for work in the field, making a total of $260,000. We had already passed a bill for a total of $300,000. I did not care to cut it down, though I would be very glad to agree to the Senate amendment without an amendment, and I increased the amount so that it would reach a total of $300,000.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: If the Farm Loan Board, after some observation, at least, although a limited observation, is incompetent to regulate the salaries of its employees, how may the Senate be more competent without any observation at all or without any knowledge of the work required to be done by the employees?

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Speaker, it has long been the duty of Congress, both in the House and in the Senate, to make appropriations for the salaries of officials in Washington. We do know something about the business. We do know something about the comparative salaries that should be paid, the amount that is paid in one department or one division of the Government and the amount that is paid in another, and we have to have something of uniformity. This new Farm Loan Board does not know a thing about the salaries paid in Washington.

Mr. GLASS. I understand when Congress undertakes to fix salaries it fixes them on the recommendation of the heads of the departments, having some knowledge of the duties to be performed.

Mr. MANN. Yes. And I notice that Congress usually refuses the recommendations of the heads of departments for increases of salary. They are always making them, and they seldom get them, and the men do not quit because the salaries are not increased.

Mr. GLASS. I quite agree with the gentleman that the gross amount of $300,000 should be restored, but I dissent from the proposition that the Senate committee knows anything more about what is an adequate salary for these respective employees than the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. MANN. We know more about what is an adequate salary than the Farm Loan Board, and we know what salary the secretary of a board usually gets. We know what the private secretary of members of a board usually gets, and we know what the stenographer usually gets, and we know what the chief of the Bond Division usually gets.

Mr. GLASS. Well, some secretaries are worth more than other secretaries. The secretary of the Federal Reserve Board is receiving $9,000 a year, but he is something more than a mere secretary. He is an expert.

Mr. MANN. We do not give $6,000 a year to any private secretary, and we do not pay $9,000 to the secretary of anything except of a department; or, if it is done, it is unknown to Congress and a gross piece of extravagance.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman that it does not cost the United States Government a cent to pay the salary of the secretary of the Federal Reserve Board; neither does the Farm Loan Board pay $6,000 for a private secretary.

Mr. MANN. They did propose to pay him $6,000-

Mr. GOOD. For a $3,000 job.

Mr. MANN. Yes; to fill a $3,000 job.

Mr. GLASS. How does the gentleman know it is a $3,000 job? Mr. MANN. From long experience and observation in this body, and from a knowledge of what salaries are paid generally to officials in Washington.

Mr. GLASS. Does the gentleman know anything of the experience and observation of the members of the Farm Loan Board?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has

Mr. MANN. I know something about them individually, but do not want to go into that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Norton].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I think that the amendment suggested by the Senate is a very desirable and much-needed one. I have been very much interested in observing the workings of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and my observations have led me to believe this-and I say it without any personal feeling or prejudice toward anyone—that the gentlemen having in charge the organization of the Federal Farm Loan System seem more interested in traveling about the country and employing clerks at fat salaries and wasting time than they seem interested in getting down to business and establishing this system and putting it into operation.

There is nothing complex in the work of organization and establishment of the Federal Farm Loan System, and there is no real necessity in paying any big, fat salaries in that bureau any more than in any other bureau in the Government. I want to say here and now that I trust that all the members of the Federal Farm Loan Board in the next few weeks and in the next few months will give more time to the real work that they are employed to do than they have been giving and not depend so much upon the secretary of that board to do all the work.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow an interruption at that point?

Mr. NORTON.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Has the gentleman visited the office of the Farm Loan Board?

Mr. NORTON. Yes; I have visited the office of the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. McCRACKEN. If the gentleman will take the trouble to inquire he will find that the members of that board are very busy. I say that in defense of them. The gentleman is not stating what is entirely true.

Mr. NORTON. I make the statement I have made on my own responsibility and on my own personal observations, and I repeat that it is a statement founded on fact, and the gentleman's kind view of the matter does not change the facts and condition that exist.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I think I never met any member of the Farm Loan Board, but there was a hearing before the Committee on Appropriations, or a subcommittee, at which the secretary of the Farm Loan Board appeared, and he exhibited in that examination, as it seemed to me, more knowledge of the whole subject than anybody that we have met.

Mr. GLASS. That is so.

Mr. NORTON. Yes; Mr. Flannagan is a very able gentleman and well acquainted with the work of this bureau.

Mr. CANNON. It seemed to me so.

Mr. GLASS. And he is receiving the munificent salary of $3,000.

Mr. MANN. What did he get before?

Mr. GOOD. Is it not perfectly natural that the secretary of the committee that formulated this bill should have a wider knowledge than some one outside, who did not know anything about it?

Mr. NORTON. That is very true, and I think the gentleman referred to has. But I want to say that neither Mr. Flannagan nor any other man is indispensable to the organization of the Federal Farm Loan System. Many men who are fully competent and able to do the work that a secretary of the Federal Farm Loan Board is required to do can be secured at a salary much less than the secretary is receiving at present. What I want now is to have some real work done down there by the Farm Loan Bureau and this farm-loan system put into operation without further delay, dillydallying, and idling.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] to recede from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment 22 and concur in the same with the amendment read by the Clerk.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LEVER. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker. Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment reported again.
The SPEAKER. W

Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 43, by striking out in line 1, "$182,380" and inserting "$222,380," and in line 2, striking out "$260,000" and inserting "$300,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from South Carolina demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 55.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion to concur in Senate amendment 22 with an amendment will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 162, nays 189,

  The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
  The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.
- Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the House disagreement to the Senate amendment 22.
- The motion was agreed to.
  The SPEAKER. The next amendment is No. 58, which the Clerk will report.
  - The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations made for the Bureau of Education; whether for salaries or expenses or any other purpose connected therewith, shall be used in connection with any money contributed or tendered by the General Education Board or any corporate or other organization or individual in any way associated with it, either directly or indirectly, or contributed or tendered by any corporation or individual other than such as may be contributed by State, county, or municipal agencies; nor shall the Bureau of Education receive any moneys for salaries or any other purpose from the General Education Board or any corporate or other organization or individual in any way associated with it, either directly or indirectly, or contributed or tendered by any corporation or individual other than such as may be contributed by State, county, or municipal agencies, except by act of Congress authorizing the same, nor shall any person paid, in whole or in part, by any such corporation or individual for services rendered by him, be employed by the Government or become or remain an officer or employee of the Government. Any person violating any or either of the terms of this proviso shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not less than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment as the court may determine.

- Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.
  - The previous question was ordered.
- The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment 58 with an amendment.
- The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

  The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment,
- Senate amendment 62.
  - The Clerk read as follows:
- (62) In order to promote economy in the distribution of supplies, and in auditing and accounting, the Postmaster General may designate districts and central offices in such districts through which supplies shall be distributed and accounts audited, but in no case shall the postmaster at the central station be given authority to abolish offices, to change officers or employees in offices included in such district.
- Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 62 and agree to the same.
- Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion. We have debated it for an hour or two. Mr. MONDELL. I think I was on my feet.
  - Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But I had the floor.
- Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman from Wyoming speaks in favor of his motion, some of us ought to have an opportunity to speak in opposition to it.
- Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say that we have discussed this, I think, until every Member of the House thoroughly understands if
- Mr. STEENERSON. But there has been something discovered since.

- Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield me five minutes?
- Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes.
- Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, Senate amendment 62, found on page 120 of the bill, is identical with the provision which the House adopted on this subject and placed on the Post Office appropriation bill, with the exception of one word. The change is not material. In the language adopted on the Post Office bill the words "accounts rendered" were used and in the Senate amendment the words "accounts audited." The effect is exactly the same. This is the language in relation to accounting. The House has agreed to provide a central accounting office, and if my motion prevails we will again have declared our purpose in the form that it was declared the other day, and we shall have declared our opposition to branch post offices.
- Mr. STEENERSON. If the motion of the gentleman is adopted, will the language be the same as it is in the Post Office bill which is now in conference?
- Mr. MONDELL. Except the word "audited."
  Mr. STEENERSON. I hope Members all understand that. If the motion is carried it leaves the provision substantially as now in the Post Office bill which is in conference. That is what the

  Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.
- The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question.
  - The previous question was ordered.
- The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the centleman from Wyoming to recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment 62 and concur in the same.
- The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Mondell and Mr. Cox) there were 106 ayes and 12 noes
- Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.
- The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the - point of no quorum, and the Chair will count.

  Mr. DILL (during the count). Mr. Speaker, I was under a misapprehension, and I withdraw the point of no quorum.
- The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington withdraws his point of no quorum. The motion is agreed to, and the Clerk will report the next amendment.

- The Clerk read as follows:

  On page 52, strike out all of section 7, beginning with line 3 and ending with line 18, and insert the following:

That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for increased compensation at the rate of 15 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate per annum of $480 or less, and for increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate of more than $480 per annum and not exceeding $1.000 per annum, so much as may be necessary is appropriated: Provided, That this section shall only apply to employees who are appropriated for in this act specifically and under lump sums or whose employment is authorized herein: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein."

- Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment 71.
  - Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard upon that.
- Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].
- Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Byrns] that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment. The other day the House agreed to the conference report upon the Indian appropriation bill, which carried the Appropriation Committee's provision in reference to increased compensation. The other day the Senate disagreed to the conference report upon the Agricultural bill, which carried a compromise between the Smoot amendment and the House Committee on Appropriations' proposition. Of course, it is not permissible to refer to the debates in the Senate, and, although I have read the debates, I shall not refer to them. But I want to say, so that others may hear and read, that the House can be just as stubborn as any other legislative body. [Applause.] passed this proposition. The Senate passed the Smoot amendment. The Senate has rejected a compromise, and apparently by its action sent to the House proposes to insist upon the original Smoot amendment. I am told by gentlemen that the Senate will never agree to anything but the Smoot amendment. I have told some gentlemen that, in my opinion, the House never would agree to the Smoot amendment. [Applause.] gentlemen in the Senate of the United States want to take the responsibility of shutting off the supplies of the Government for its continuance, let them assume that responsibility. I am not willing that the House shall write itself down as a mere annex, a vermiform appendix, to the Senate of the United States. [Applause.] Some gentlemen may think that the only legislative wisdom rests in the Senate of the United States. I do not. When we are met with a proposition that the House and the Senate conferees instead of compromising on a matter and the Senate conferees instead of compromising on a matter between them must give the Senate its way, and that the House shall be compelled under a threat to yield to the Senate I shall meet the threat and fight. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this is no time to be getting into a warlike mood. There should be an air of peace and calm over the House. Members should keep cool. The imporcalm over the House. Members should keep cool. The impor-tant thing for the House of Representatives to do is to transact the public business and to adjust the differences that may exist between the Houses and finish the work of this session by the 4th of March. I am willing to go as far as any Member of this House in insisting upon the provision that originated in the Committee on Appropriations, at my suggestion, for the increase in the compensation of the Federal employees, but I am not prepared to announce now that I intend to be so stubborn as to bring about a situation that will result in an extra session of Congress unless we can increase the compensation of Federal employees. For the first time in a service of 18 years the Senate of the United States has apparently taken a position against increasing the compensation of employees because of the very great burden it will place upon the Treasury of the United States, and I do not intend to act in such a way as forever to discourage the Senate from taking such a position again. [Laughter.] It may not take very much resistance upon our part to kill right in the beginning what promises to be the most hopeful sign of reform in the Federal Government in the last two decades, and while I am ready to do what may be possible, and while I hope that the managers representing the House on these various conferences may have such persuasive powers as will bring the managers of the Senate to see the light of reason and to harmonize our difference, I am unwilling to announce to the House, I am unwilling to have this side of the House assert, that it will insist upon having its way in the matter of omnibus increases of compensation to Federal employees at the risk of an extra session of Congress. Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no misunderstanding, if I am put to a choice between an extra session of Congress and increasing the compensation of Government employees, the Government employees will lose my support. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I offer a preferential motion. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment. I am not going to vote for my motion, but it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes a preferential motion that the House concur in the Senate amendment

No. 71. .

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1515).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19119) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 14,

30, 32, 43, 44, 46, 51, 54, 55, 62, 71, 85, 89, and 96.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 45, 47, 48, 52, 53, 56, 57, 58, 59, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, 73, 74, 75, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 90, 92, and 95, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same.

ROBERT N. PAGE. JAS. MCANDREWS, C. R. DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to get a chance to make a motion to concur in Senate amendment numbered 8. Will I have that chance after this vote has been taken?

The SPEAKER. Not if the vote is taken; no.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that amendment No. 8 is not included in the report. It is in disagreement and will come up after the adoption of the conference report

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask in regard to amendment No. 16.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is in disagreement also. Mr. LINTHICUM. And I will have a chance to move to concur in that?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to ask the same question in regard to amendment No. 97.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I desire to ask the gentleman with reference to amendment No. 76.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman will allow me, amendment No. 76 is in disagreement and is not included in the report.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the same privilege will be recorded reference to that?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. And amendment No. 97 also? Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. What is that?

Mr. AUSTIN. Amendment No. 97 in reference to intangible property?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Amendment 97 is also in disagreement

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further disagree to Senate amendment No. 8.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House further disagree to Senate amendment No. 8.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate amendment No. 76 be considered first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand a word the gentleman said. Mr. FOSTER. I ask that Senate amendment No. 76 may be considered first. Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask this simply as a favor as I am compelled to go away.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to consider amendment 76 first. Is there objection?

Mr. PAGE. of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina objects, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keating] desires to be heard on his motion to concur in Senate amendment No. 8. I yield to him five minutes

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keat-ING] is recognized to make some remarks, and all other gentlemen will please refrain from them.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, amendment No. 8 has to do with the enforcement of the child-labor laws in the District of Columbia. At the present time the task of enforcing these laws is assigned to two privates from the Washington police force, and the Senate has inserted an amendment providing that two inspectors shall be appointed at salaries of $1,200 a year. An effort to secure this amendment has been made on a number of occasions, and the House conferees have persistently refused to concur.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Do not these policemen act as truant officers?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know, but I do know that two privates from the Washington police force are expected to enforce the child-labor laws in the District of Columbia. The Senate amendment has been urged by various civic organizations and others interested in this work, including, as I understand it, the judge of the juvenile court. Now, my contention is that if these police officers are good men they are needed on the police force to perform the duties of policemen. If we are to keep the child-labor laws of this District on the statute books we should do here what they have done in most of the States, provide a proper system of inspection and proper methods of enforcement. I hope the House will insist on concurring in the Senate amendment, which provides for the appointment of inspectors.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, referring to what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keating] has said, since this child-labor law in the District of Columbia was placed on the statute books it has been enforced by two privates from the Metropolitan police force. These men have now been for three or four years in this employment, and the result of the adoption of the Senate amendment would lead to the employment of two additional persons. The statement made by the gentleman from Colorado that these privates were needed back on the force of the Metropolitan police can hardly be berne out in face of the fact that the House has just adopted the conference report that adds to the Metropolitan police force 90 privates

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carelina. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has no desire to misquote me, and perhaps I was unfortunate in the way I expressed myself. What I endeavored to say was this, that if these men are policemen, if they are good policemen, put them back to the work which they were intended to perform, and let us have inspectors who are especially fitted to enforce the child-labor

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Up to four years ago these gentlemen were on the Metropolitan police force, but whether as privates or otherwise, I do not know. But their employment for the last four years has been in the enforcement of the child-labor law on the statute books, and now that is their employment, and I think they ought to be continued and that we ought not to make two additional employments. I have no more to say

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. Mr. BUTLER. Now, is there complaint that this law is not well enforced?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have heard no complaint except from certain sources that possibly are interested in the two new employments that would be given if this amendment is

Mr. KEATING. I assume responsibility for it, and say, yes.
Mr. BUTLER. Is it necessary to increase the force in order to enforce the provisions of this child-labor law? I want to see it well enforced.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It would give employment to two people who might be selected outside of the classified service if this amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Are these men who have been doing this work for six years especially detailed to this work?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They have done nothing else, and I should say they have been trained and that they are perfectly familiar with the law and its enforcement.

Mr. FOSTER. They do not change them about, and let them act as policemen for a while and then go back?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The same people have been assigned to the enforcement of this law since it was passed, which, I am informed by the clerk, was six years ago, and they have been in that employ constantly for six years.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker—— Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. HARDY. Did I understand the gentleman from North Carolina to say that practically these are inspectors, who also have the authority to make an arrest in case it is needed?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly. They have the authority that is conferred in the child-labor law, and they are also members of the Metropolitan police force.

Mr. HARDY. And their work has been this inspection work? Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. For six years, since the law was put on the statute books. The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentle-man from Colorado [Mr. Keating] to concur in Senate amendment No. 8

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.
Mr. KEATING. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 71.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keating] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

[The Speaker proceeded to count.]
Mr. KEATING (during the count). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The ayes are 13, noes 71. So the amendment to concur is rejected.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 16.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 16.
Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker-

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from West Virginia rise?

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. To move that the House concur in Senate amendment No. 16.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LITTLEPAGE] moves that the House concur in Senate amendment No. 16.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the amendment numbered 16 reads as follows:

Damages and payment for ground on account of condemnation proceedings: To pay Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller for ground taken and damages on account of condemnation proceedings in square No. 2838, in the city of Washington, $3,820.

Mr. Speaker, this item has occurred in every District of Columbia appropriation bill for the last four years. It grows out of proceedings in condemnation by a jury appointed under the law in the District of Columbia for the establishment of a building line in Thirteenth Street, adjoining Park Road. persons mentioned here were a part of those against whom damages were assessed and in whose behalf benefits were allowed, the jury returning this verdict. Some of those who were involved in the property against which damages were placed appealed to the court, to the proper court of the District of Columbia, from the verdict of the jury. The case was heard in due course in court, and the verdict of the jury was con-These defendants accepted the verdict of the court, firmed. certainly by not taking an appeal, as they had a right, to a higher court.

The evidence also shows that they accepted the verdict of this court by paying one of the three annual assessments that had been made against them without complaint. But time elapsed; several years have elapsed; and, instead of paying the two additional assessments, having lost and not having taken advantage of the opportunity to appeal to a higher court from the verdict of this jury, they undertake in an appropriation bill to collect a claim, if it is anything, against the District of Columbia.

Now, I want to say to the membership of this House that it will not be my lot to handle this District of Columbia appropriation any more, but somebody else will handle it, and there are claims, not less than a thousand of them, on the same basis as this, and if this is allowed on an appropriation bill, repealing a judicial decision of a court in the District of Columbia, then you will have a thousand, if you deal out equity—a thousand claims that will find their way into this bill—and you will be confronted with them.

I know that there is not a Member of this House, certainly not a Member on this side of the House, who has not had a personal appeal made to him by somebody at the other end of the Capitol because this man happened to be an employee of that body. These are the facts I the of that body. Those are the facts. If the membership of this House, or of this side of the House, want to vote merely upon a personal appeal on the part of men at the other end of the Capitol and repeal a decision and open a Pandora's box, very

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that in the same suit, on a lot adjoining this, the jury assessed damages and then made an award, but in this case it took the man's land and then assessed damages against him?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They did not take any of his They took title from him, but every foot of the land is in his front yard.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. The question is whether the gentleman thinks this Congress more able to determine equity than that Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; that is the question.

Mr. RAKER. May I answer the gentleman's question? Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RAKER. About five minutes

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Oh, I can not yield to the gentleman now. The gentleman can do that later. That will take too long

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland five minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. I would like to have five minutes, too.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lin-

THICUM] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Page] said that the District took no land from Mr. Keller; that they merely took the title from him. The truth is that Mr. Keller's land went right down to the street, and he had a right to that land along the sidewalk. The District took this property from him and set him back 30 feet. They changed those lots from commercial uses, being on the sidewalk, for which it could be sold, to a residential basis, 30 feet back from the sidewalk and parked in front.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Does the gentleman know of any other lot except one on that whole block where the line was not set back in the same way?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know that there are any other lots except that lot on the corner; and the District took that and Keller's two lots. All the balance of that property is set back 30 feet, and now the Government has taken title to that property and set it back 30 feet, destroying its use as store property. I do not know whether the gentleman can see this little plat that I have in my hand; but this explains the situation.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Has the gentleman ever been on those premises'

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know that I have; but I have seen them very often.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have been on them several times

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have not had the pleasure that the gentleman has had.

Mr. EAGLE. Pleasure or punishment?

was made. It had only a small building valued at $1,500, leaving for the ground $4,500.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM.

Mr. BUTLER. Were all these facts given to a jury?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I presume they were. The jury ought to have gone there and inspected the property. I presume they did, but that does not make it right. Now, this man was charged for benefits when he got absolutely no benefit, while his property, as I say, was set 30 feet back, 1,500 square feet having been taken from him. He has to pay benefits, while the man on the corner, right alongside of him, is given $6,000 damages, with no charge whatever for benefits. Now, what the amendment proposes is to allow this man the value of his property and take off what would have been a reasonable benefit, $320, leaving $3,820 for his property. There is nothing unfair about this proposition. The man who was corporation counsel at the time, Mr. Edward H. Thomas, says:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 25, 1914.

Hon. John Walter Smith, United States Senate.

Hon. John Walter Smith,

United States Senate.

Sir: On June 13, 1910, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia filed their petition in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, holding a district court in cause No. 880, to establish a building line on the west side of Thirteenth Street NW., between Park Road and Monroe Street, under the authority of an act of Congress approved June 21, 1906, entitled "An act providing for the establishment of a uniform building line on streets in the District of Columbia less than 50 feet wide." Under the provisions of this law the assessment jury is required to assess benefits equal to the amount of damages, including all expenses of the proceeding. Among the parcels of property to be taken, and which were taken, under this proceeding, in square 2838, were part of lot 11, being the east 25 feet by full width of said lot, containing 750 square feet, owner Thomas W. Keller, and part of lot 12, being the east 25 feet by the full width of said lot, containing 750 square feet, owner Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller, and part of lot 12, being the east 25 feet by the full width of said lot, containing 750 square feet, owner Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller, and part of lot 12, being the east 25 feet by the full width of said lot, containing 750 square feet, owner Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller, and part of lot 12, being the east 25 feet by the full width of said lot, containing 750 square feet, owner Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller, and part of lot 12, being a continuation of a building line established by subdivision on the west side of Thirteenth Street, running about two-thirds of the block. It appears that there were two jury verdicts and that the cost of the first verdict, which was set aside, was $421.55, the total expenses being $721.55, and this sum was ultimately added to the damages found, making the total damages awarded $7.896.88. The total benefits assessed where also $7.896.88.

As to said part of lots 11 and 12, the jury found damages of $562.50 each, or $1,125, and

That is what the former corporation counsel says. He felt himself that it was unfair and unjust, but he could not help it under the conditions.

Now, Mr. Keller did not take an appeal, because Mr. Conrad H. Syme, corporation counsel later, advised him not to take an appeal, as his letter, which I insert, states:

AUGUST 23, 1916.

Hon. Robert N. Page, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dean Mr. Page: In accordance with your verbal request of this morning that I should advise you as to any information I had relative to the proceedings to establish a building line on Thirteenth Street near Park Road, in which the property of Thomas W. and Alice Kellar was

Mr. EAGLE. Pleasure or punishment?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman say who made the plat?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say the gentleman from Alabama did not make the plat. He has been too busy on the immigration bill.

Mr. BURNETT. The jury of this man's neighbors said he was not entitled to anything.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have often found, as the gentleman perhaps has found in Alabama, that assessment juries do not always do justice to values; they are not infallible.

Mr. BURNETT. It is pretty apt to.

Mr. LINTHICUM. In this case, 30 feet was cut off the front of this man's property. Fifteen hundred square feet of his property was taken. He was assessed damages of $1,125 and benefits $1,605. In other words, 30 feet of the front was taken off the property there, and he was assessed $502.50 benefits more than damages. From the property right adjoining, which two data and involved the taking not only of all of that portion of the Keller was located right alongside of his, they tool. only 1,344 square feet and represented Thomas W. and Alice Keller. They would like which had been previously established by restrictions in the deed of the holders. Their lots were under no such restriction and they would have had the right to build to the inner curb. As their roperty, have made an admirable site for an apartment house. As the property, have made an admirable site for an apartment house. As the property was taken of the front was taken off the property was taken. He was assessed damages of $1,125 and benefits $1,605. In other words, 30 feet of the front was taken off the property when the property of Thirteenth Street, and they allowed the owner $6,000. Both properties were side by side, and no charge for benefits on the latter whatever side by side, and no charge for benefits on the latter whatever.

public improvement Keller not only lost the property I have indicated but was compelled to pay a large sum in addition. He lost his property and the opportunity to make it available and valuable for business purposes, and I was not then and am not now able to see that any corresponding benefit accrued to him. I am satisfied the verdict was a very unjust one, and I believe Mr. Thomas, who was then corporation counsel, was of the same opinion.

I discussed with Mr. Keller the question of taking an appeal to the court of appeals from the award in this case. I advised against it, not because I did not think it was unjust and inequitable, but because my observation and experience had been that where many different interests were involved in the proceeding, the court of appeals would be reluctant, because of individual injustices done to one party, to reverse the entire proceeding, and I was unwilling to risk the heavy cost attendant upon failure to sustain the appeal. I believe I was correct as to this. One of the parties owning property on Park Road appealed, but was unsuccessful.

The above statement is my present recollection of the circumstances of this case. While considerable time has elapsed since it was tried, I believe my memory is substantially accurate.

In my judgment, the situation of the Keller property is anomalous, and the probabilities are that if relief was granted by Congress in his case a precedent would not be established which would occasion annoyance to Congress by the importunities of other disgruntled owners, as I doubt that any other piece of property in the city presents an exactly similar aspect.

In closing permit to say that in my judgment the present method of assessing damages and benefits in the District of Columbia works many hardships. I believe it is unjust to say that the benefits accruing in taking property for public use must equal the damage or a fixed part thereof as matter of law. I believe both are facts which should be judicially ascertained, and that the proportion of ben Corporation Counsel, District of Columbia.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask two minutes additional.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There are a number of gentlemen here who want to speak on this.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want only two minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield two minutes, or not?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield two additional minutes. Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can not yield any part of that two minutes, unless I can get more time.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman must understand that there are a number of gentlemen here who desire to speak on this, and I can not do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for two minutes, and the time is running.

Mr. LINTHICUM. This letter of the corporation counsel says he advised him not to take an appeal, because a number of people in that block had the same interest, and so on, and he was satisfied that the court would ratify the verdict and he would likewise be fought by the corner-lot owner receiving the $6,000. He paid his first assessment, but why did he pay it?

Because if he did not pay his assessment they would have sold his property, and he had to pay the assessment to hold on to his property until he could finally make an appeal to Con-I want to say to the gentlemen of this House that I have talked to Mr. Keller personally about this matter. I have known him for a long time, and he is a man who would not ask this redress unless it was fair and just. I have looked into this case, and I think Congress ought to grant him this amount, $3,820, and ought to concur in the Senate amendment. The Senate looked into the matter thoroughly, and they concluded he was entitled to it and inserted it in the bill, and we ask that the amendment be concurred in.

[Senate Rept. No. 921, 64th Cong., 2d sess.]

[Senate Rept. No. 921, 64th Cong., 2d sess.]

Mr. Smith of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Smith of Maryland to the bill (H. R. 19119) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, viz, to pay Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller for ground taken and damaged on account of condemnation proceedings, $4,140, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The subcommittee to which was referred the amendment of Senator Smith of Maryland to the District appropriation bill report that they examined Thomas W. Keller and considered the letters and tables of assessment of damages and benefits affecting the proceedings of condemnation of which he complains.

Our conclusion is that Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller have substantial grounds for complaint in the premises, and the manifest injustice done them should be rectified.

We think, however, that the amount of this claim should be reduced by the sum of $320, which apparently would be the amount of assessment of benefits they would have been called on to pay had suitable recompense been made for their land taken in the condemnation proceedings in proper proportion to the amount paid to the adjoining

With this deduction in the amount named in the proposed amend-ent, we recommend the appropriation proposed to the amount of $3,820.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis].

Mr. Lewis].

Mr. Lewis].

Mr. Lewis and gentlemen of the House, if you could have time to understand this case, you would realize that it is one of marked peculiarities. Here was a block in the city of Washington, known as a square, as to which, except with reference to lots 11, 12, and 13, all of the other lots were back to a desirable building line. Some agitation began to force the other three lots back to this building line. As to lot 13, a jury sat on the case, took down the house, and awarded damages of $6,000, the house being worth about $1,500 out of the $6,000. As to lots 11 and 12, now in controversy here, the result of the jury's verdict was the imposition of a so-called technical benefit as a burden on the owners, Mr. and Mrs. Keller. Under the law the jury were not free to act otherwise. They were not exercising the equitable discretion that we might suppose a jury would exercise. They were obliged under the statute to impose a "benefit" tax upon this man, because all of his land was not taken

The remaining facts are these: The land in lot 13 which was taken consisted of 1,344 feet. The land taken from lots 11 and 12 consists of 1,500 feet. The owner of lot 13 got $6,000, of which $4,500 was for his land alone. The owner of lots 11 and 12 got nothing, but was subjected to the burden of an alleged benefit besides. His lots have become so shortened that uses to which he might have put them are now denied. He could have put an apartment building upon them, and I believe that was in his mind. By reason of this litigation one of these lots is now only some 58 feet in length and is incapable of being put to commercial or apartment building use. It is very well for the chairman of this committee to argue this case on the presumpcharman of this committee to argue this case on the presumptions of law. That is a very good argument to make upon grounds of general policy and will appeal to a body like this, but I think if the Members of the House could make an individual study of this matter they would find an anomaly presented, resulting in an absolute injustice to a proprietor in this city who is entitled to protection of law rather than the unpaid damages imposed upon him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield to a question?
Mr. LEWIS. No; I do not. If this were a criminal case, some opportunity of appeal would exist. If a man were convicted by forces of the law, without regard to the justice of his conviction, without regard to the justice of the application of the law in a given instance, an appeal might be made to the governor or executive to remit the fine or to pardon the offense itself. In a case of this sort, involving a property right, the only appeal the individual can make is to a body like this. It is being made by this gentleman to-day, and in my opinion is being justly made. He ought to be given damages for the property that has been taken away from him, just as the other property owner has been given damages, and he ought to be given whatever amount may be determined by the committees of this House.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties involved in this case is that all the parties were in the same suit. Being in the same suit, after the award by the jury it went to the court for approval, and, of course, this one man was responsible for the costs if he went further and then lost. This attorney, who is now attorney for the District of Columbia advised him not to appeal for fear that the others, having such a large award, having got $6,000 for land adjoining, while this man Keller had to pay $480—if he went further he might have to pay the whole expense. The jury allowed an award or found that he was damaged for this land adjoining $6,000, and this man Keller had property just as useful for business purposes. The Committee of the Senate on Claims have examined this matter and reported it out favorably for $3,820. The Committee on the District of Columbia have gone over the same thing and reported favorably, and we now find it in this bill.

I can not conceive, when you talk about the judgment of a jury in this case, the district attorney, heretofore and the present district attorney, when that was tried advised him not to appeal. He stated that the award was in the judgment of the jury; that no testimony as to value of different pieces of property is heard, but the jury looks at the property and fixes the value of the property. It can be shown how unjust it is in this There were two pieces of property lying side by side, and one man is awarded damages for $6,000 while the other man's property is taken from him and he is assessed as to benefits for the remaining part of his property $480. Then the gentlemen say he must yield to this assessment because he paid the benefits assessed. Why, surely he had to pay the benefits assessed, because they were a lien on the balance of his land.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield just now. If he had not paid the $480 benefits assessed for the land taken he would have lost not only the land that was taken but the balance of his land.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER.

Mr. RAKER. Yes. Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman assumes that he made in one payment the assessment for the purpose of re-moving the lien on his property. There are two assessments still unpaid.

Mr. RAKER. -Then they will have to be paid, because having assesed him $480 they may take his land. The only thing to do was to pay the assessment and save the rest of his home, and then come to this body that can give him relief. After this body looks into the matter, sees that they have the justice and the equity on their side, and, although there has been an award by the jury—not exactly a jury, but of men who went out there and gave their own personal judgment—then let this body do justice to Keller. You gentlemen would not want a case adjudicated by men who would take two pieces of property lying side by side and give one man $6,000 and assess benefits amounting to $480 on the other when the property was in the same condition. That being the case, they appealed to this Congress, notwithstanding the award of the jury in this case; notwithstanding the fact that judgment has become final; notwithstanding that there is no chance to appeal. This is a question of equity here. There is a question of justice here, and there is a question of right. These people ought to be paid for their land in proportion to the amount awarded to the other party.
Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.
Mr. HARDY. Does it not look to the gentleman like this, that the cases being all one they did not want to appeal it for fear that it would be reversed as to the fellow who got the $6,000 damages?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Did not the gentleman say that this man's Mr. HARDY. attorney advised him not to appeal for fear they might reverse the whole judgment?

Mr. RAKER. No; just the reverse of that. For fear the judgment might not be reversed, and all the expenses would have to be paid by this man Keller and his wife. The other party had received an award of $6,000, and if they could convince the court that the whole award was proper it would be maintained, notwithstanding it might be wrong as to the Kellers. Kellers could no doubt apply to the court to have the award set aside upon questions of law. The jury's award having settled the facts under the peculiar statute in the District applicable to this class of cases, and not having a question of law which would authorize the court to set aside the award, the attorney for Kellers advised them that it would be useless to appeal. In this there may have been an error of judgment. At any rate, an injustice has been done, and it can and should be remedied. That injustice can be righted by adopting this Senate amendment.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fitzgerald].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] and the gentleman from California [Mr. Raker] would not yield for a question. I asked both of them to yield at the time they were speaking of one party getting $6,000 and the other getting only $600. I wished to ask the two gentlemen if it is not a fact that the award to the person who received $6,000 was made because his was a short lot and had upon it a storehouse of value that had to be included in the award, while to Mr. Kellar was awarded damages resulting from the taking of the portion of the front of his lot and benefits assessed to the other portion of the lot that was of value, while what remained of the Johnson lot was of no value whatever.

Here are the facts of the case: There is a law providing the method by which the Government takes property under the right of eminent domain and by which the compensation to be paid is determined. We have a definite procedure which must be followed, and it was followed in this case. This man was given an award for damages and assessed for benefits. The attorney advised him not to appeal the case, because his case was such that he feared the expenses of the appeal would be added to the assessment for benefits. He acquiesced in the judgment of the jury. He could have taken an appeal to the court and had his rights determined. There has been no similar case in the history of the District of Columbia brought into the Congress of the United States. The only reason this case is brought here year after year is the fact that this man is an employee of the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States has attempted to override the law and to give this man a special advantage because he is a favorite employee of the Senate. The House of Representatives for six years has resisted this action, which is an attempt to loot the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of a favored employee of a branch of the Federal Government. It is time we so manifested our opposi-tion that nobody will ever again have the effrontery to press this claim or to have it stated with the suppression of some of the essential facts necessary properly to understand it.

If the House believes that when the Government of the United States or the Government of the District of Columbia proceeds to take property, title to which is in an employee of the Senate, and that person is dissatisfied with what is awarded to him in the orderly process of law, he can appeal to Congress and get redress or relief that another citizen or property owner in the District could not obtain, then we ought to vote this money. He is a nice, popular, respectable man, and if we believe we ought to give him something out of the Treasury without any excuse, this is the opportunity to do it.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the personal qualities of the man appear before the jury

Mr. FITZGERALD. But if we believe that the law is made for all, that everyone should be treated alike, that a man when he pursues his remedy in court and acquiesces in what is done without an appeal to the proper authorities—

Mr. TALBOTT. That is what he is complaining about. It is too late to appeal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course it is too late now.
